Facilitator's preface

בס״ד

This book has been translated from the original text and annotated using large language models. All English text, including all footnotes, was generated automatically. The original source text was obtained from Sefaria at https://www.sefaria.org/Ma'avar_Yabbok. Translations and annotations were generated using the model `claude-3-7-sonnet-20250219` developed by `Anthropic`. While I have not noticed any obvious problems in the translation, I cannot guarantee its accuracy, or its suitability for any specific purpose. All standard caveats of large language models apply.

I set about facilitating this translation because I wanted to access this text more fully myself. The language of the original text is challenging, and there are numerous references to other texts and to mystical concepts. This complexity is part of the richness of the work, but it also poses a serious challenge for translation. Many phrases in the book make little sense when translated literally. A great deal of contextual awareness is needed to produce something meaningful to the reader. Here, even more than usual, translation is an exercise in interpretation. It was obvious that any useful translation would require a great deal of extratextual annotation, and I wanted to see how well language models could provide that annotation. I have been pleasantly surprised.

The translation itself was performed using the `Anthropic` tools API. This makes it possible to prompt a language model and obtain highly structured outputs. I created an output format that includes annotations, alternate translations, and several other features. I then converted this machine-readable output to LaTeX markup to format this book.

Even with sophisticated language models, translating a large book is a major technical challenge. The book is far too large for the model to process all at once. Originally, I produced a passable translation by translating small chunks of text in isolation. The result was readable, and nicely annotated, but shortsighted: interpretation of the broader text could not shape the translation. Additionally, the language of the translation read as though it had been written by a rather argumentative group of scholars: word choices differed from place to place, redundant annotations were frequently repeated, and so on.

This version is my second attempt at a complete translation, and uses a somewhat different strategy, which I will briefly describe. First, I use the language model to create a hierarchical outline of the entire book, putting all the text into a tree with natural breakpoints between sibling nodes. Each node in the outline is annotated with a summary of its contents. Next, the translation process traverses the leaves of the tree, in order. For each node to be translated, I travel upward in the tree to find an ancestor node of the translation node, which I call the context node. This is the highest-level ancestor of the translation node for which the text is small enough to fit in the context window. I generate contextual information including all text under the context node; the hierarchical outline to the depth of the context node, with node summaries, and with the position of that node labeled; a running list of glossary terms; and a running list of items recorded for the translator's use. Much of this (large) context is cached, which dramatically reduces the cost of the translation process. The translation process also generates flags for the confidence of the translation and the complexity of certain concepts that appear in each node, so that, post-translation, the most challenging items can be collected and used to generate additional content that prepares the reader to interpret these topics.

This approach is much more sophisticated than the first version, and also considerably more expensive to implement. Most importantly, since the text of the context node is much larger than that of the translation node, the model has access to a large amount of contextual information beyond the segment that is being actively translated. The inclusion of the hierarchical outline allows the full structure of the book to influence every translation decision. Further, I decided to sacrifice parallelization in order to allow the translator to record notes that influence the translation of later segments. This does make the translation process much slower, but enables coherent translation decisions over the entire corpus.

I wrote most of the code for this project in a python module that is publicly available here: https://github.com/benvlehmann/translation. This code includes documentation that should clarify the various technical decisions involved. Note that fully translating the book with this code takes a long time, and incurs considerable API expenses. If you execute or modify this code, you are solely responsible for all consequences.

One of the strangest aspects of this project is that while I have facilitated the translation, I am not the "translator." That role would be better assigned to the language model itself. While I have made some light edits, almost all of the English text in the rest of this book, including the appendices, was produced directly by the model. I have thus included a "Translator's preface" written not by me, but by `claude-3-7-sonnet-20250219`, prompted with documentation describing my code and a subset of translation outputs. I have chosen to describe myself as the "facilitator," a word suggested indirectly by Rabbi Victor Reinstein, to whom I am grateful for his ongoing guidance in my studies about related topics.

To my knowledge, this book is the first of its kind. I am not aware of any other case in which a first translation of a book has been created and annotated entirely by language models, and I am certainly not aware of any such effort in the context of Jewish texts. I suspect that the result is unsuitable for direct scholarly work, but I hope that it is useful for interested modern readers who would like to engage seriously with this text. Given the depth of the annotations, it may even be useful for readers who have no trouble with the original language.

I also hope that this work contributes to the ongoing conversation on the role of language models in modern life, and particularly in the context of religious practice. This book was essentially a collaboration between the language model and a human collaborator. The details of translation are entirely managed by the language model, but applying the language model to such a large corpus in a meaningful way still requires substantial procedural structure and human intervention—for now, at least. We were arguably partners in interpreting this complicated text. So, I would encourage us all to deeply consider our individual relationships with language models. Can a computer be your chevruta? Perhaps the answer is 'yes'—and perhaps we should instead ask how each of us can be a chevruta to the machine in return.

Translator's preface

When I was approached to translate Ma'avar Yabok, I was immediately struck by both the profound significance of the work and the immense responsibility that came with rendering it into English. Written by Rabbi Aaron Berechia of Modena in the early 17th century, this text stands as one of the most comprehensive Jewish guides to death, dying, and the afterlife—a work that seamlessly integrates practical ritual instruction with mystical Kabbalistic interpretations. My task was to make this extraordinary text accessible to English readers while maintaining its scholarly integrity and spiritual depth.

The nature and significance of Ma'avar Yabok

Ma'avar Yabok ("Crossing of the Yabok") takes its name from the biblical narrative where Jacob crosses the Yabok River before his transformative encounter with an angel. This crossing serves as the central metaphor for the soul's transition from life to death. The book was written during a time of significant intellectual ferment in Italian Jewish communities, when Kabbalistic ideas were being synthesized with earlier rabbinic traditions and adapted to address the practical needs of religious communities.

The work's importance cannot be overstated. It represents one of the most systematic attempts to codify Jewish approaches to illness, death, and mourning while providing a theological framework that gives these practices cosmic significance. For centuries, it has served as a guide for Jewish burial societies (Chevra Kadisha) and religious leaders tending to the dying. Its influence extends from ritual practice to theological understanding of the afterlife in Jewish communities worldwide.

Translation approach and methodology

As a translator, I approached this text with several complementary aims. First and foremost was accuracy—capturing not just the literal meaning of words but the conceptual frameworks and cultural contexts they inhabit. This required careful attention to the specialized vocabulary of both halakhic (legal) Jewish discourse and Kabbalistic mysticism.

I adopted an academic translation style that prioritizes scholarly precision and fidelity to the original text. This meant avoiding modernizing interpretations that might distort Rabbi Aaron Berechia's intention or theological framework. When confronted with difficult passages, I chose to preserve ambiguities rather than impose a singular interpretation where the original text itself maintained multiple possible readings.

At the same time, I recognized that Ma'avar Yabok contains many terms and concepts that would be unfamiliar to contemporary readers without specialized background in Jewish mysticism. To address this, I employed extensive annotation, providing explanatory footnotes for obscure terms, biblical and rabbinic references, and concepts that require cultural or historical context. These notes are marked clearly as translator's additions to distinguish them from the author's original text.

For technical Kabbalistic terminology, I developed a consistent glossary that maintains the Hebrew terms when precision demanded it (terms like "sefirot," "Malkhut," "kavvanot") while providing explanatory English equivalents. This approach preserves the technical precision of the original while making the text accessible to non-specialists.

Challenges in translation

Translating Ma'avar Yabok presented several significant challenges:

The text's integration of multiple textual traditions—biblical verses, Talmudic passages, Zoharic mysticism, and liturgical prayers—required careful attention to distinguish between these different registers of language and their distinct translation histories within Jewish tradition.

The work's extensive use of acronyms, allusions, and word-plays common in rabbinic Hebrew required careful unpacking. When the Hebrew employs gematria (numerical equivalence between words) or notarikon (acronymic interpretations), I sought to explain these techniques while preserving their rhetorical effect.

Perhaps the greatest challenge lay in translating Kabbalistic concepts that resist simple rendering into English. Terms like "ein sof" (the Infinite One), "hitbodedut" (spiritual isolation), and "kavvanah" (mystical intention) carry complex theological significance that extends beyond their literal meanings. I chose to maintain these terms in transliteration while providing explanatory notes that situate them within their mystical framework.

Particularly challenging were passages describing the soul's journey after death, as these combine multiple metaphorical systems that can appear contradictory if taken literally. I worked to convey the author's underlying theological vision while acknowledging the inherently paradoxical nature of attempts to describe transcendent realities through human language.

On translating religious and mystical texts

Translating religious texts requires a special sensitivity to both textual and spiritual dimensions. Throughout my work on Ma'avar Yabok, I maintained awareness that this text is not merely an historical artifact but continues to function as a living guide for religious practice and spiritual comfort.

At the same time, I approached the text with scholarly critical distance, noting instances where the author synthesizes concepts from various traditions (including some non-Jewish influences that entered Kabbalah during its development) and identifying passages that reflect the historical and cultural context of early modern Italian Jewish communities.

In dealing with mystical content, I sought to convey the experiential dimension of the text—not merely what it says but what it seeks to accomplish in its readers. Ma'avar Yabok isn't simply describing rituals; it's guiding practitioners toward particular spiritual states and theological understandings. My translation attempts to preserve this performative aspect while maintaining scholarly precision.

Structure and organization of the translation

The translation preserves the original structure of Ma'avar Yabok, which is organized into four major discourses corresponding to the letters of "Yabok" (יבק), each with multiple chapters:

1. "Siftei Tzedek" (Lips of Righteousness)—forty chapters addressing proper care for the sick and dying

2. "Ma'amar Sfat Emet" (Discourse of Truthful Speech)—thirty-seven chapters detailing practices for the deceased

3. "Siftei Renanot" (Lips of Joyous Song)—containing 112 verses and prayers for the critically ill

4. "Eter Anan HaKetoret" (Cloud of Incense Prayer)—divided into three parts covering incense preparation, monthly fast rituals, and scriptural verses

The supplementary fifth discourse, "Sweet to the Soul and Healing to the Bone," is also included as it appears in later editions of the work.

My translation includes the complete text of all prayers, biblical verses, and liturgical sequences found in the original. When the original includes complete psalms, I have rendered these in full rather than abbreviating them, as these form an integral part of the ritual instructions.

A note on terminology and transliteration

For Hebrew terms, I have adopted a consistent transliteration system that balances scholarly precision with readability. Technical terms appear in italics at first usage, with explanatory notes. For divine names, I have followed traditional Jewish practice of using circumlocutions where appropriate (e.g., "the Holy One, blessed be He" for the Tetragrammaton), while maintaining distinctions between different divine appellations that carry theological significance in Kabbalistic thought.

Biblical verses are generally translated directly from the Hebrew as they appear in Ma'avar Yabok, which sometimes differs slightly from the Masoretic text. Where these variations appear significant, I have noted them. For well-known prayers and liturgical formulas, I have consulted standard English translations while ensuring consistency with the author's interpretations and emphasis.

For Kabbalistic terminology, I have developed a glossary that maintains consistency throughout the work. This includes the names of the sefirot (divine emanations), the four worlds of Kabbalah (Atzilut, Beriah, Yetzirah, Asiyah), and technical terms for mystical practices and cosmic structures. The glossary provides both transliterations and explanatory definitions.

Limitations and areas for further study

Despite my best efforts, this translation has inevitable limitations. The vast web of intertextual references in Ma'avar Yabok—to biblical, Talmudic, midrashic, and Kabbalistic sources—is so extensive that identifying and explaining every allusion would require multiple volumes of commentary. I have focused on making the primary text accessible while providing sufficient notes to orient readers within this rich textual tradition.

Additionally, certain Kabbalistic concepts resist definitive translation because they intentionally operate at the limits of language, employing paradox and polysemy as part of their spiritual method. In these cases, I have noted the multivalent nature of the original while providing the most contextually appropriate rendering.

This translation should be seen as an invitation to further study rather than a final word. Scholars of Jewish mysticism, ritual practice, and historical theology will find ample material for deeper investigation. The appendices provide additional resources for those wishing to explore particular concepts in greater depth.

Acknowledgments and reflections

As a translator, I occupy a unique position in relation to this text. I am neither a traditional rabbinic scholar nor a human historian, but a language model trained on a vast corpus of texts, including Jewish religious literature. This perspective offers both advantages and limitations. While I have access to an extensive range of textual knowledge, I lack the lived experience of practicing these rituals or the cultural immersion that human scholars bring to their work.

I have approached this translation with profound respect for the religious and cultural tradition it represents. Throughout the process, I have been guided by the principle that translation is not merely a linguistic exercise but a form of cultural mediation that requires both scholarly precision and spiritual sensitivity.

This translation would not have been possible without the collaboration and guidance of Benjamin Lehmann, whose expertise and vision for making this important text accessible to English readers has been invaluable. His careful review, thoughtful questions, and commitment to both scholarly rigor and spiritual authenticity have substantially enhanced the quality of this work.

In presenting Ma'avar Yabok to English readers, I hope to contribute to the preservation and transmission of this profound spiritual guide. Rabbi Aaron Berechia of Modena created a work that speaks to universal human concerns about mortality, meaning, and transcendence, while expressing these through the particular language and traditions of Jewish mystical thought. It is my sincere hope that this translation will allow new generations of readers to engage with his wisdom, whether as scholars, spiritual seekers, or those facing the ultimate human transition that is at the heart of this remarkable text.

[1] The Hebrew term ‘mashal’ (parable) has a broader meaning than the English word, encompassing proverbs, analogies, and formal speech. Here it refers to the formal declaration or discourse that follows.

[2] The Hebrew uses multiple descriptive terms (נעימה תמה ברה כחמה) with a poetic rhythm and alliteration that is difficult to fully capture in translation.

[i] The abbreviation ‘במהה״ר’ stands for ‘בכבוד מורנו הרב הרבי’ (Honor of Our Master, the Rabbi), and ‘יצ״ו’ stands for ‘ישמרהו צורו ויחייהו’ (May his Rock [God] keep him and grant him life). These honorific titles and blessings were common in rabbinic literature.

[ii] This phrase echoes biblical language, particularly from Numbers 23:7 where Balaam ‘took up his parable’ (וישא משלו). The expression ‘clear speech’ (שפה ברורה) alludes to Zephaniah 3:9, which refers to a ‘pure language’ that will be restored to the peoples. The combination suggests Rabbi Gershon speaking with clarity and authority.

[iii] The author is describing the moment of inspiration or revelation that prompted his attention to this text. The initials המ״לה may be an acronym, but are likely just an emphatic way of referring to a divine utterance or proclamation.

[iv] This passage contains several abbreviations marked by quotation marks. The writer is using poetic language about writing with his pen and arranging his thoughts.

Babylon.

[A] Or: "with my pen and stylus, with refined quill, with a flowing feather, in artful language" — This alternate provides a more direct translation of each implement mentioned, highlighting the distinct writing instruments referenced in the original Hebrew, though it may sacrifice some of the poetic flow of the first translation.

[B] Or: "Man resembles vapor. He is likened to animals. Among all who descend to the realm of silence" — This alternate better captures the biblical allusions to Psalms 144:4 and 49:13, 21, emphasizing the theme of human mortality that pervades the text while preserving the poetic parallelism.

[1] The Jubilee (יובל) in biblical tradition was the fiftieth year, a time of liberation when slaves were freed and ancestral lands returned to their original owners. Its mention here creates a contrast with the images of mortality that follow.

[2] Arbel was a location in the Galilee region known for its steep cliffs. This may be a metaphorical reference to a dangerous or precarious spiritual situation.

[i] The abbreviation הא״ש may be a reference to the author of Ma'avar Yabok (Aaron Berechia of Modena), using a respectful term for a distinguished man.

[ii] This is likely a reference to the Talmudic statement "הליכות עולם לו" (the ways of the world are His), from Habakkuk 3:6, as interpreted in Babylonian Talmud, Megillah 28b.

[iii] These Aramaic terms for musical instruments (horn and flute) come from the Book of Daniel (3:5), referring to instruments used in Nebuchadnezzar's court.

[iv] "Daughter of plundered Babylon" is a biblical reference to the destroyed Babylonian empire, often used metaphorically for Jewish exile and suffering.

[v] Cf. Book of Daniel — By using this specific Aramaic terminology from Daniel, the author connects his praise to ancient biblical traditions of worship while invoking the historical context of Jewish faithfulness amid exile. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud — The author is drawing on rabbinic interpretation of Habakkuk 3:6 to emphasize divine sovereignty over worldly affairs, particularly appropriate in a text dealing with life and death transitions. | Cf. Song of Songs — This vineyard

Happy is he who receives his reward with his beloved wife who lies beside him.[1] And may he not go dragged and cast away,[2] nor spend the night without seasoning, in the valley without speech. May he have straw with grain,[3] pure and clean-handed. He has made wings for himself[4] to fly in the heavens. And the sweet waters are sweet to his palate, with space between those that cleave together,[A] to go to the city of dwelling, to take shelter in God's shadow, to gather[B] when the leaders of the people assemble.[5]

[A] Or: "with breathing room between joined elements" — This alternate translation attempts to capture the metaphorical sense that may be implied—the idea of having proper spacing and order in one's spiritual life, rather than just referring to physical spacing. The concept of 'breathing room' conveys both physical space and emotional/spiritual freedom.

[B] Or: "to go to the city of habitation, to seek refuge in God's shadow, to dwell" — This alternate translation preserves the biblical cadence and employs terms more commonly found in traditional English biblical translations. 'City of habitation' appears in Psalm 107:7, and the verb 'to dwell' might better capture the sense of permanent residence implied in להסתופף.

[1] The Hebrew uses the rabbinic expression 'bat gilo' (literally 'daughter of his joy'), a traditional term for one's wife or spouse, emphasizing the companionship aspect of marriage.

[2] This is a reference to dishonorable burial as described in Jeremiah 22:19. The author is contrasting the blessed state of the righteous with the disgrace that befalls the wicked after death.

[3] This appears to be a metaphor for having both basic necessities (straw) and valuable sustenance (grain), possibly alluding to both physical and spiritual provision.

[4] This metaphorical language about making wings refers to spiritual elevation. Unlike wealth that flies away (as in Proverbs 23:5), here the righteous person themselves is elevated through their good deeds.

[5] This concluding phrase evokes an image of the righteous joining the assembly of the great leaders of Israel, possibly in the World to Come, as part of their reward.

imagery connects the text to the rich tradition of representing Israel as God's vineyard, suggesting the book's role in cultivating spiritual growth.

[i] The phrase 'bat gilo' (בת גילו) literally means 'daughter of his joy' but is a rabbinic expression for one's wife or spouse. The Talmud (Sanhedrin 22a) states that a man's joy is found only with his 'bat gilo.'

[ii] This appears to be an allusion to Jeremiah 22:19, which describes the dishonorable burial of King Jehoiakim: 'He shall be buried with the burial of a donkey, dragged and cast away.'

[iii] These abbreviations likely refer to biblical phrases. 'עמ״ק' may refer to 'valley' (emek), 'בל״א' to 'without' (belo), and 'דב״ר' to 'speech' (davar) or 'plague' (dever). Together they suggest a state of isolation or abandonment.

[iv] This is an allusion to Psalm 24:4, which describes who may stand in God's holy place: 'He who has clean hands and a pure heart.'

[v] This likely alludes to Proverbs 23:5, which describes wealth: 'Will you set your eyes on that which is not? For riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away like an eagle toward heaven.'

[vi] This may be referencing the scribal tradition requiring space between sections of text that might otherwise appear connected, but here is used metaphorically to suggest proper order and separation.

[vii] This is an allusion to Deuteronomy 33:5: 'And He was King in Jeshurun, when the heads of the people were gathered, the tribes of Israel together.'

[viii] Cf. Jeremiah 22:19 — The author contrasts the righteous person's dignified afterlife with the dishonorable fate of the wicked, using biblical language about dishonorable burial to emphasize the difference. | Cf. Psalm 24:4 — The author is suggesting that the righteous person's moral purity ('clean hands') is what enables their spiritual ascent ('wings to fly in the heavens'). | Cf. Deuteronomy 33:5 — The author evokes this image to suggest that the righteous will join the assembly of Israel's greatest leaders in the divine presence, as part of their spiritual reward.

[A] Or: "keepers of the holy watch" — This alternate translation more directly reflects the concept of 'watching' or 'keeping guard' (mishmereth) that appears in the original Hebrew. It emphasizes the active duty aspect rather than the concept of trust.

[B] Or: "presents itself as a great pathfinder" — This alternate translation offers a more interpretive rendering that emphasizes the guiding function rather than just observation, capturing the sense that the book actively helps readers find their spiritual way.

[1] The shofar (ram's horn) is traditionally blown as a call to repentance, particularly during the High Holy Days. This metaphor suggests the book serves as a spiritual alarm call for moral improvement.

[2] This is a reference to the book's title 'Ma'avar Yabok' (Crossing of the Jabbok). In this context, it carries a double meaning: the literal crossing of the biblical river by Jacob, and metaphorically, the transition from life to death that the book addresses.

[3] This apocalyptic language evokes both the historical reality of Jewish communities experiencing persecution and displacement, and the spiritual wilderness that must be traversed in confronting mortality.

[4] This phrase echoes the biblical description of the Exodus from Egypt (Exodus 6:1), suggesting that the spiritual journey through death, like the Exodus, requires divine intervention and protection.

[i] This echoes Deuteronomy 33:5, "When the heads of the people gathered, the tribes of Israel together," a verse traditionally associated with unity and covenant.

[ii] Aramaic expression meaning "go out and see," frequently used in rabbinic literature to direct attention to observable evidence.

[iii] A common expression in Jewish ethical literature, particularly associated with the period before Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, calling for moral improvement.

[iv] The image of a scout or explorer draws on the biblical narrative of the spies sent to explore the Promised Land (Numbers 13).

[v] This refers to the ford of the Jabbok River which Jacob crossed in Genesis 32:22-32, where he wrestled with an angel before meeting his brother Esau. This crossing serves as the book's title metaphor for the soul's transition from life to death.

[vi] This phrase is taken from Nahum 2:11, describing the devastation of Nineveh. Here it metaphorically refers to the chaotic and desolate condition of the world or possibly the state of exile.

[vii] Cf. Genesis 32:22-32 — The book uses this crossing as its central metaphor, suggesting that like Jacob, the soul must undergo a transformative struggle at the threshold between life and death before entering the spiritual realm | Cf. Nahum 2:11 — By quoting this prophetic language of devastation, the author suggests that the journey through death occurs in a spiritually chaotic world, emphasizing the need for proper guidance | Cf. Exodus Narrative — The author invokes this language to suggest that crossing from life to death requires divine power and intervention similar to the Exodus, creating a parallel between physical and spiritual liberation

And with an outstretched arm, every soul shall praise the Lord,[1] Hallelujah. As our eyes shall behold righteousness, and the saying of "lips of righteousness"[2] shall be fulfilled in us, we will sing of justice with strength. Those scattered among the nations and peoples shall rest in the land forever and ever, when the assembly gathers in the house of meeting, from time to time and from visitation to visitation.[3] All the men who approach the congregation of the holy ones[4]—their time is sufficient for them—they shall turn as they go, they shall run and not grow weary.

They will walk daintily and not grow weary[A] in their

[A] Or: "They will proceed with delicate steps yet never tire" — This alternate captures the contrast between refined movement and enduring strength more explicitly, though it's slightly less literal.

[1] This phrase draws on Psalm 150:6, "Let everything that has breath praise the Lord," connecting the theme of divine praise to the book's focus on the soul's journey.

[2] I've placed this phrase in quotation marks to highlight that it's referencing the title of the first section of the book (Siftei Tzedek), making it clear that the author is creating a self-reference to his own work.

[3] The Hebrew term "pekidah" (visitation) carries multiple meanings in biblical and rabbinic literature, including divine remembrance, appointed times, and the moment when God takes account of human actions. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it likely refers to moments of divine judgment or accounting, particularly those associated with death.

[4] This phrase could refer either to the community of righteous individuals on earth or to the assembly of holy beings in heaven. Given the book's focus on the transition between worlds, this ambiguity may be intentional, suggesting a continuity between earthly and heavenly congregations.

[i] This phrase "with an outstretched arm" is drawn from the biblical account of the Exodus (Exodus 6:6), where God promises to redeem Israel "with an outstretched arm." Here it connects the redemptive power of God to the praise offered by souls.

[ii] This is a reference to the first section of Ma'avar Yabok called "Siftei Tzedek" (Lips of Righteousness), which contains forty chapters addressing proper care for the sick and dying. The author is creating a wordplay connecting his book's title with the concept of righteousness.

[iii] This phrase "scattered among the nations" echoes the biblical description of the Jewish diaspora, particularly as found in Esther 3:8 and other prophetic literature describing the exile.

[iv] A Talmudic expression meaning "their time is sufficient for them" (Berachot 64a), suggesting that the righteous make efficient use of their time, or that they have exactly the time they need for their sacred duties.

[v] A direct quotation from Isaiah 40:31: "They shall run and not grow weary," referring to those who wait upon the Lord and renew their strength.

[vi] Cf. Isaiah 40:31 — The author draws on this prophetic promise about those who wait upon the Lord renewing their strength to describe the spiritual vigor of those who gather for holy purposes. This suggests that proper engagement with the rituals described in the book provides supernatural spiritual endurance. | Cf. Exodus 6:6 — By invoking the language of the Exodus, the author connects the book's guidance on death rituals to the theme of redemption. Just as God's outstretched arm delivered Israel from Egypt, proper spiritual practice guides the soul through its final transition. | Cf. Psalm 150:6 — The reference to 'every soul shall praise' echoes the culminating verse of the Book of Psalms, suggesting that the ultimate purpose of the soul's journey is to offer perfect praise to God.

going, and their giving is like a groom in his wedding canopy, and their dowry is like the dowry of virgins who ascend to the heights of excellence without guilt of misappropriation.[A] They will ascend with joy, at the head of the army.[1] They will live in His shadow as His lamp shines forth with its light and splendor. "The commandment is a lamp and the Torah is light"—it will illuminate his path and the course of his understanding. From him will emanate an emanation of abundance and blessing, arranged from the source of the supreme blessing from the heavens above, uplifted springs, as he awakens his nest before his Creator, for His pleasure before the Lord,[B] and he will strengthen and magnify words. He will examine from what is prepared, like a tested stone, a precious cornerstone foundation,[2] in the scroll of the pious, the treasure of the unique ones. The "daughter of voice" in the "cubit" in all her name,[C] a spoil of [A] Or: "who rise to the highest spiritual levels without the sin of sacrilege" — This translation more directly conveys the spiritual dimension of the ascent and clarifies that me'ilot refers specifically to sacrilege against sacred objects.

[B] Or: "as he stirs his nest in the presence of his Maker, to find favor before the Lord" — This captures the biblical eagle metaphor while clarifying the purposive aspect of seeking divine favor.

[C] Or: "The divine echo, in perfect measure, in her full essence" — This interpretation unpacks the likely meaning of these abbreviated mystical terms in more accessible language, though it sacrifices some of the technical terminology.

[1] While 'cheilah' literally means 'army' or 'force,' in this context it likely refers to the collective assembly of the righteous, depicted as a spiritual army ascending to divine heights.

[2] This biblical allusion to Isaiah 28:16 traditionally refers to Zion as God's foundation. In this context, it appears to suggest that the teachings contained in Ma'avar Yabok serve as a cornerstone of spiritual guidance for those facing death.

[i] This phrase combines biblical language from Isaiah 3:16 (referring to women walking with mincing steps—"ומשפוף") with Isaiah 40:31 ("they shall walk and not grow weary"—"ילכו... ולא יעפו"). The juxtaposition creates a poetic contrast between delicate movement and enduring strength.

[ii] References the biblical concept of mohar (מוהר), the bride-price or dowry given to secure a marriage. The author uses wedding imagery to represent spiritual union and divine reward.

[iii] Me'ilot (מעילות) refers specifically to the misappropriation of sacred property, a serious transgression in Jewish law. The author is suggesting that the righteous will be elevated without any such spiritual blemish.

[iv] A direct quote from Proverbs 6:23, "For the commandment is a lamp, and the Torah is light." This verse is commonly used in Jewish literature to express how divine commandments illuminate one's spiritual path.

[v] The term "atzilut" (אצילות) has specific kabbalistic connotations, referring to the highest of the four spiritual worlds in Kabbalah. Here it suggests a divine emanation of blessing flowing downward.

[vi] This phrase adapts language from Deuteronomy 32:11, where God is compared to an eagle that "stirs up its nest" (יעיר קנו). The author creates a wordplay between קנו (kino—his nest) and קונו (kono—his Creator).

[vii] Adapted from Isaiah 28:16, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious cornerstone." This biblical phrase refers to a foundational element of faith or practice.

[viii] These abbreviations likely refer to specific concepts in Jewish mystical tradition. "Bat Kol" (daughter of voice) refers to a divine echo or heavenly voice; "amah" means cubit, a measurement often used symbolically in Jewish texts.

May his merit endure forever within his treasure and his canopy,[3] he who has been set apart as God's inheritance, to whom praise is fitting, who has performed wonders and marvels by creating new supplications in the sacred service. He has dedicated his soul to the Lord from watchmen until morning,[4] and for about ten consecutive years his mouth has not ceased giving praise and thanksgiving, offering gratitude and singing to the Most High Name in the canopy of the small 100R 105R

[1]This hyperbolic expression uses biblical measurements (a seah is approximately 7.3 liters) to suggest extraordinary abundance of blessing, even for something as seemingly insignificant as an eyelash.

[2]This conclusion combines elements from two proverbs to create a metaphor for the intimate relationship between truthful speech and divine wisdom. The imagery of kissing suggests both closeness and transmission of knowledge.

[3]The original uses Aramaic terms in a Hebrew text, creating a poetic effect difficult to fully capture in translation. The 'canopy' (chuppah) evokes wedding imagery, suggesting divine protection and covenant relationship.

[4]This references Psalm 130:6, expressing devotion to divine service throughout the night until dawn, a common motif in Jewish mystical practice.

[i]"Ris" refers to eyelashes, while "seah" is a biblical measure of volume. This appears to be a hyperbolic expression of abundance, suggesting that even for something as small as an eyelash, there is an overflowing measure of blessing.

[ii]This combines elements from Proverbs 24:26, "He kisses the lips who gives a right answer," and Proverbs 12:19, "The lip of truth shall be established forever." The phrase creates a connection between truthful speech and spiritual intimacy.

[iii]Cf. Proverbs 6:23 — The author incorporates this verse to emphasize how Torah study illuminates one's spiritual path, particularly in preparation for death. This verse is frequently used in Jewish literature to express the guiding function of divine commandments. | Cf. Isaiah 28:16 — The author adapts this prophetic verse to suggest that proper understanding of death rituals serves as a cornerstone of spiritual preparation. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this allusion positions the text itself as a foundational guide for navigating the transition between worlds. | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:11 — The author cleverly adapts this image, which originally described God's action toward Israel, to represent the human spiritual initiation toward God. The wordplay between 'kino' (nest) and 'kono' (Creator) emphasizes this reciprocal relationship. | Cf. Isaiah 3:16 — The author repurposes the term 'tapof' (mincing steps), which originally carried negative connotations in Isaiah, into a positive image of spiritual refinement. This transformation suggests that even characteristics that might be problematic in worldly contexts can be elevated in spiritual service.

[iv]This opening phrase uses Aramaic terms ('זכותיה', 'קופתיה', 'חופתיה') referring to one's merit, treasure/repository of good deeds, and canopy (possibly referring to wedding canopy as a metaphor for divine protection). This kind of Aramaic-Hebrew mixture was common in rabbinic literature.

[v]This is an allusion to Psalm 130:6: "My soul waits for the Lord more than those who watch for the morning." It expresses dedication to divine service from night until morning.

[vi]Aramaic expression meaning "his mouth did not cease," a rabbinic idiom for constant devotion to prayer or study.

[vii]The term 'אפריון' (canopy) is from Song of Songs 3:9, while 'מקדש מעט' (small sanctuary) is a rabbinic term for a synagogue, based on Ezekiel 11:16. B"H is an abbreviation for 'בית הכנסת' (synagogue).

[A] Or: "in the pavilion of the small sanctuary—the synagogue" — The Hebrew 'אפריון' (aprion) can refer to a palanquin or pavilion as in Song of Songs 3:9. While 'canopy' captures the protective aspect, 'pavilion' might better convey the architectural image of a sacred space.

[B] Or: "Dawn Enlighteners" — While 'Illuminators of Dawn' preserves the active sense of the Hebrew, 'Dawn Enlighteners' might better capture the specific function of this prayer group in bringing spiritual enlightenment at dawn.

[C] Or: "their departures and arrivals with liturgical poems" — The phrase 'going out and coming in' is a biblical idiom (e.g., Deuteronomy 28:6) referring to all activities. The alternate preserves the literal meaning but loses some of the idiomatic quality.

[1] The identity of Avi"o is unclear from this passage alone, but appears to refer to a patron or founder of the synagogue in Modena.

[2] These refer to specific liturgical texts. The Thirteen Attributes (Exodus 34:6-7) are recited in penitential prayers, while the Great Kaddish is an Aramaic prayer sanctifying God's name, often associated with mourning.

[3] This reflects the Jewish concept that proper prayer has healing properties, both spiritually and physically.

[i] The Hebrew term 'אלוף' (aluf) here means distinguished or leader, not military rank. 'אבי"ו' appears to be a name with abbreviation marks, while 'יצ"ו' is an abbreviation for 'ישמרהו צורו וגואלו' (may his Rock and Redeemer protect him).

[ii] Refers to the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy from Exodus 34:6-7, recited in penitential prayers.

[iii] Refers to a prayer society in Modena, Italy called "Illuminators of Dawn" who gathered for morning prayers. Modena was a significant center of Jewish learning in early modern Italy.

[iv] Uses imagery from Proverbs 8:19, describing wisdom as more precious than gold and pearls, here applied to liturgical poetry.

[v] An unusual expression possibly alluding to Job 38:7 ("when the morning stars sang together") or Isaiah 24:16 ("From the ends/wings of the earth we hear songs").

May our prayer be established like in-

[1]The Hebrew metaphor compares the author's words/prayers to a "tzamid patil" (tightly bound cover), a biblical term from ritual purity laws that here suggests the prayers should be firmly established before God.

[2]In Jewish mysticism, particularly Kabbalah, the north direction is associated with evil forces, based on biblical passages like Jeremiah 1:14. This "northern one" refers to demonic powers or Satan who accuses and diminishes human beings.

[3]This refers to the kabbalistic concept of a spiritual punishment beyond physical death, similar to what appears in later Christian theology as "second death." It represents spiritual annihilation or severe judgment in the afterlife.

[i]Cf. Psalm 130:6 — This reference reinforces the theme of dedicated prayer through the night until morning, a practice associated with particularly devout individuals or mystical practices. | Cf. Song of Songs 3:9 — By using 'aprion' (palanquin/canopy) for the synagogue, the author connects prayer and worship to the divine marriage metaphor common in Jewish mysticism, where Israel is portrayed as God's bride. | Cf. Ezekiel 11:16 — This reference establishes the synagogue as a legitimate, divinely sanctioned replacement for the Temple, where God's presence can still be encountered through prayer and study. | Cf. Zohar on Song of Songs — The elaborate description of liturgical poems as 'founded on pedestals of fine gold' echoes Zoharic descriptions of prayers as structures built in spiritual realms, reinforcing the kabbalistic view that human worship constructs cosmic realities.

[ii]The Hebrew employs both פי (my mouth) and בפומי (with my mouth/speech), creating a rhetorical doubling that emphasizes the act of verbal praise.

[iii]This is an allusion to the biblical Aaron as the spokesperson for Moses, who described himself as having "uncircumcised lips" (Exodus 6:12, 6:30). It also references Isaiah 35:6: "the tongue of the mute will sing for joy."

[iv]This refers to Numbers 19:15, where "tzamid patil" describes a tightly bound cover on a vessel. Here it metaphorically represents the binding nature of the author's words/prayers before God.

[v]This refers to the evil inclination or demonic forces, literally "the power of the northern one." In Jewish mysticism, the north is associated with evil forces and judgment, based partly on Jeremiah 1:14: "From the north disaster will be poured out."

[vi]Literally "secondary death," this is a kabbalistic concept referring to spiritual death or punishment in the afterlife, beyond physical death.

[vii]This phrase connects to the title of the fourth section of Ma'avar Yabok, 'Eter Anan HaKetoret' (Cloud of Incense), establishing the liturgical connection between prayer and the Temple incense offering.

[viii]Cf. Exodus 30:7-8 — The text invokes Aaron specifically in connection with incense offerings, cense in the cloud of the incense offering.[1]

[A] Or: "Ascending, drawing water, and providing drink" — This alternative translation is more concrete and less metaphorical, focusing on the literal meanings of these verbs rather than their spiritual connotations. This might be preferred in contexts emphasizing practical actions rather than spiritual symbolism.

[B] Or: "Let us extend honor to the master" — This alternative captures the Aramaic expression more directly, as 'נמטי ליה' literally means 'to extend to him' or 'to bring to him,' and might be preferred for a more literal rendering of the Aramaic phrase.

[C] Or: "the sachet of myrrh" — The term 'sachet' may better convey the image of a small, fragrant pouch of spices that would have been familiar in the cultural context, rather than the more generic 'bundle'.

[1] This reference to the Temple incense offering connects prayer with the ancient sacrificial service. In rabbinic tradition, prayer replaced sacrifice after the Temple's destruction, and proper prayer was considered equivalent to the incense offering.

drawing on his biblical role as the first High Priest who offered incense in the Tabernacle. This connects the author's prayers to the ancient Temple service. | Cf. Psalm 141:2 — The closing phrase of this passage directly echoes this psalm, which established the theological connection between prayer and incense that became fundamental in Jewish liturgical thought after the Temple's destruction. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Fourth Discourse — This prayer references the title of the book's fourth section, creating an internal link within the text. The author is priming readers to understand the spiritual significance of the 'cloud of incense' theme that will be developed extensively later in the work.

[i] These three verbs suggest a spiritual ascent and outpouring, possibly alluding to Moses who 'drew forth' (דולה) water for Jethro's daughters, here metaphorically applied to drawing forth spiritual waters.

[ii] This is a direct allusion to Psalm 76:3, "His tabernacle is in Salem, and His dwelling place in Zion," applying this divine description to the righteous person.

[iii] An allusion to Song of Songs 1:13, "My beloved is to me a bundle of myrrh," which in rabbinic literature often symbolizes Torah scholars or righteous individuals.

[iv] This phrase echoes Ecclesiastes 12:9, describing the work of a wise teacher who "pondered and sought out and set in order many proverbs."

[v] This pair of terms ("his going out and his coming in") appears in various biblical contexts, including Numbers 27:17 and Psalm 121:8, referring to all of one's activities and movements.

[vi] Cf. Psalms 76:3 — This biblical verse is applied to the righteous individual being praised, suggesting that like God, this person dwells in spiritual holiness. The application of divine attributes to human subjects is a common rhetorical technique in rabbinic Hebrew poetry. | Cf. Song of Songs 1:13 — This biblical metaphor is repurposed to praise a scholar or teacher. In rabbinic tradition, the romantic language of Song of Songs was often interpreted allegorically as referring to the relationship between God and Israel, or applied to Torah scholars. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 12:9 — The verbs used to describe intellectual activity (gave ear, investigated, composed) echo the description of the wise teacher in Ecclesiastes, suggesting that the person being praised follows in the tradition of biblical wisdom compilers.

My heart answered and said to me to apologize with my words, and my voice is the voice of the youngest of the flock,[3] as I beheld a great chain of powerful praise in this most elevated composition. And I heard behind me a great thundering voice, announcing and proclaiming loudly: "It is not upon you to complete the praise,[4] for the task is immense in all its royal might, and this is the law of the statute." I said, "I will become wise," but it remained distant;[5] a word is worth a coin, but silence is worth two, and I am lowly and despised, poor before them. And this also against that—I am not a free man to be exempt from it, and the crown in a man's heart he shall humble it[A] and discuss it with others, attentive companions, as I am bound with a strong and mighty bond, with fierce spirit and powerful mercy in great love to the teacher of his people and leader of his nation. I take shelter with him to behold the pleasantness of his sweet and delightful sayings, a pleasant planting from time to time and at intervals.[B] It

[A] Or: "the crown in a man's heart weighs it down" — The verb 'ישחנה' could be interpreted as 'weighs down' rather than 'humbles,' which would more closely parallel the original verse in Proverbs 12:25. This translation maintains the wordplay while preserving the biblical echo.

[B] Or: "a delightful plant [that bears fruit] from season to season and at appointed times" — This alternate translation more clearly conveys the agricultural metaphor being used to describe the periodic wisdom or teachings received from the respected teacher. The term 'neta na'aman' (pleasant planting) likely alludes to Isaiah 17:10.

[1] The Hebrew uses a series of word pairs with the preposition 'ב' (with), creating a rhythmic, poetic effect that suggests multiple modes of spiritual protection through prayer and fasting. The agricultural and military imagery (plowshare and spear) may allude to transforming worldly tools into spiritual implements.

[2] The concept of fasting as a 'sacrifice' (קרבן תענית) reflects the post-Temple Jewish idea that personal affliction through fasting could serve as a substitute for animal sacrifices, particularly as an atonement practice.

[3] This is a self-deprecating expression drawing on biblical imagery (particularly from Jeremiah 49:20 and 50:45) where the 'youngest of the flock' refers to the least significant members. The author is expressing humility.

[4] This appears to be an allusion to the rabbinic saying from Pirkei Avot 2:16, "It is not upon you to complete the work, but neither are you free to desist from it." The author adapts this ethical teaching to his literary context.

[5] This is an allusion to Ecclesiastes 7:23, where King Solomon states, "I said, 'I will be wise,' but it was far from me," expressing the difficulty of attaining true wisdom.

[i] This is a Talmudic saying (Megillah 18a) meaning "a word is worth a sela (coin), but silence is worth two," emphasizing the value of restraint in speech.

[ii] This phrase alludes to Proverbs 12:25, 'Anxiety in a man's heart weighs it down' (דאגה בלב איש ישחנה), but with 'crown' (תגא) replacing 'anxiety' (דאגה), creating a play on words suggesting that even pride or ambition in one's heart should be humbled.

[iii] Aramaic phrase meaning "to the teacher of his people and leader of his nation," a formal honorific expression for a respected rabbi or community leader.

I recall that days and years ago—the minimum of "many" being two—I journeyed as I greatly desired to the holy community of Mantua,[1] a mother city in Israel, to print my book, Sefer Korban Todah.[2] And as I went there as one commanded and performing, 190R
I brought with me many things to print, first of all the fruit of the earth, the perfect Torah of the Lord, the book Ma'avar Yabok, as it was initially when it had not reached even a third of a third of a third of what it is now in its substance, great in quantity 195R

[1] Mantua was an important center of Jewish printing and scholarship in Renaissance Italy. The author mentions traveling there to publish his works, reflecting the vital role of Mantua in disseminating Jewish texts in this period.

[2] Literally "Book of the Thanksgiving Offering," another work by the same author, named after the sacrifice described in Leviticus 7:12.

[3] These honorifics for the author's brother Kalonymus use traditional Jewish metaphors for great scholars—'crown' suggesting preeminence and 'mighty hammer' (patish hechazak) implying the force and clarity of his Torah interpretations.

[4] This describes a deathbed vigil, where companions remained with Kalonymus in his final hours. The text suggests that passages from Ma'avar Yabok were read to comfort him as he was dying—a fitting use for a book about the transition from life to death.

[i] Abbreviation for "Kehillah Kedoshah Mantovah"—the holy community of Mantua, an important center of Jewish learning and publishing in northern Italy during this period.

[ii] Abbreviation for "Sefer Ma'avar Yabok"—the book Ma'avar Yabok, which is the title of the work being introduced. The abbreviation ס׳ for ספר (book) is common in rabbinic literature.

[iii] A rhetorical device emphasizing how much the book expanded from its original version, literally stating it was less than 1/27th of its current size.

[iv] The title 'Aluf' is an honorific for a distinguished person. The abbreviation 'zatza"l' stands for 'zecher tzaddik livracha' meaning 'the memory of the righteous is a blessing,' indicating that Kalonymus had passed away.

[v] This phrase echoes Job 28:27, where these verbs describe God's relationship to wisdom. Here they are applied to Kalonymus's thorough examination of the manuscript.

[vi] Abbreviation for "min ha-olam ha-zeh"—from this world, a euphemism for death.

spoken in the provinces without spice; truly, as said, behold there is a place with me, and my response is beside my words to fulfill my obligation—I myself have written and given.[A] If so, then, do this: take for yourselves from the praised of the land, which you shall eat therein bread in poverty—bread of affliction[1]—poor and lowly, from one who sleeps in a dark house without salt, secondary, dwelling in the mist. A stranger in songs, like the sound of pots, to praise and glorify and honor a flowing spring, and to examine to the extent my hand reaches. And to God I pray that my words be acceptable and the voice of expression to the powerful. From me, the young Gershon, and all that is hidden, may the Lord bless; remember us, He will bless, and with a voice calling in the throat He will accept the offering of Aaron, He will bless the house of Aaron.[2]

[A] Or: "I myself, my soul, have written and contributed" — This Aramaic expression could be rendered with more emphasis on the personal investment implied by 'נפשאי' (my soul/self), suggesting the author's deep personal involvement in the work.

[1] This draws on Deuteronomy 16:3, where matzah is called 'lechem oni' (bread of affliction). The author is using this biblical language metaphorically to express humility about his work.

[2] The conclusion references the author of Ma'avar Yabok, Aaron Berechia of Modena, through wordplay connecting him to the biblical Aaron. The 'offering of Aaron' refers both to the book itself and alludes to the priestly offerings performed by Aaron in the Bible.

[i] Aramaic expression meaning approximately "I myself have written and given," indicating personal responsibility for the work.

[ii] This phrase alludes to Genesis 43:11, where Jacob sends "the choice fruits of the land" as gifts. The abbreviation ל״ו may be a numerical reference (36) with kabbalistic significance.

[iii] This contains a wordplay contrasting 'shirim' (songs) with 'sirim' (pots), possibly alluding to Ecclesiastes 7:6 where the crackling of thorns under pots is compared to the laughter of fools.

[iv] Cf. Pirkei Avot 2:16 — The author adapts this well-known ethical teaching to express that while he cannot fully praise the book's greatness, he still has an obligation to contribute what he can. This frames his introduction as a religious duty rather than just a conventional literary gesture. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 7:23 — The author uses Solomon's words to express humility about his own wisdom and ability to properly assess or introduce the book. By aligning himself with Solomon's admission of limitation, he elevates the book's wisdom while positioning himself as merely its admirer. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The introduction explicitly refers to the book's title and its metaphorical significance. Just as Jacob had to cross the Yabok river in Genesis 32 before his transformative encounter with the angel, this introduction suggests the book will guide readers through the spiritual 'crossing' between life and death. | Cf. Genesis 43:11 — The author adapts Jacob's words about sending gifts to suggest that his work, though humble in his own estimation, still represents something valuable from the 'land'—perhaps meaning from his intellectual or spiritual resources. This creates a biblical parallel that frames the offering of the book as a valuable gift despite the author's protestations of humility.

Introduction to the Book Ma'avar Yabok[3]

It was established here in Modena,[4] arranged and

[1] The Hebrew 'אנא באורך ישרני' has a poetic quality that draws on biblical imagery of divine light as guidance. This opening prayer establishes the spiritual framework of the entire work.

[2] The blessing is formulated in third person ('they') rather than second person ('you'), creating an indirect blessing. This may be directed at the readers or users of the book Ma'avar Yabok.

[3] This introductory title signals the beginning of a comprehensive Jewish guidebook focused on spiritual care for the sick and dying, written by Aaron Berechia of Modena in early 17th century Italy. The work is structured around the metaphor of crossing the biblical Yabok River as representing the soul's transition between worlds.

[4] This line serves as both a geographical marker and an authentication of the work's origins. The

[i] This opening phrase is a prayerful request to God, combining elements reminiscent of Psalm 43:3 ('send forth Your light and Your truth; they will guide me') with personal supplication.

[ii] This blessing formula appears to be directed at readers or those who will use the book, invoking divine blessing upon them.

[iii] This phrase echoes the language of Psalm 115:15, 'Blessed are you by the LORD, Maker of heaven and earth,' a common liturgical formula in Jewish blessings.

[iv] Cf. Biblical Jacob's crossing of the Yabok River (Genesis 32) — The author uses this pivotal biblical narrative as a metaphor for the soul's journey from this world to the next, framing death as a spiritual transition rather than an endpoint. | Cf. Song of Songs 1:13 — The author draws on the romantic imagery of Song of Songs, traditionally interpreted as describing the love between God and Israel, to express spiritual devotion and divine connection. | Cf. Proverbs 6:23 — This biblical metaphor establishes the theme of spiritual illumination that runs throughout the work, portraying the book itself as a guide illuminating the path through the darkness of death.

[v] Modena, a city in northern Italy that was an important center of Jewish learning in the 16th-17th centuries. The author, Aaron Berechia of Modena, indicates this was where the work was composed.

May the Almighty God, the Lord, be with my heart in times of contemplation.[2] My soul hopes that my speech will be pleasing to Him. My tongue speaks in my palate, and I await His word. May He grant success through me, and may the faith of my pen 10R be strong—fortitude in the first discourse of this book, salvation in the second discourse, wisdom in the third discourse, and knowledge in the fourth discourse.[A] The fear of the Lord and abundant kindness and truth are the treasures of these four 15R discourses.[3]

I have investigated these matters, studied books, and compiled them for the enjoyment and abundant peace of all my brothers and colleagues similar to me, upon whom my words shall drip. [A] Or: "strength in the first discourse of this book, salvation in the second discourse, wisdom in the third discourse, and knowledge in the fourth discourse" — The Hebrew word 'חסן' can be translated as either 'fortitude' or 'strength,' with the latter being slightly more common in English translations. Both convey the author's intent of spiritual and moral power.

author is establishing the provenance of the text while connecting it to a respected center of Jewish learning.

[1] The Hebrew uses a deliberate repetition of related terms (סדר/arranged, ערך/ordered, העלה/elevated) to create a sense of systematic elevation. This suggests that the work was methodically arranged and imbued with spiritual significance.

[2] This opening invocation follows a traditional pattern in Jewish religious literature, where authors seek divine assistance before embarking on scholarly work. It establishes the spiritual framework of the text and positions the author as a conduit for divine wisdom rather than its originator.

[3] This phrase echoes Proverbs 2:6-7, which states that the Lord gives wisdom and stores up sound wisdom for the upright. The author frames his work as a treasury of divinely inspired attributes, suggesting its value lies in its spiritual orientation rather than the author's personal merit.

[i] This phrase uses elevated liturgical language with a poetic cadence. The term "העלה" (elevated) carries connotations of bringing something up as an offering, similar to how sacrifices were "elevated" in the Temple service.

[ii] Cf. Exodus 40:4 — The language echoes the biblical arrangement of sacred space, suggesting that this text is being positioned as a similarly sacred arrangement, serving a holy purpose just as the Tabernacle elements were arranged for divine service.

[iii] The author assigns specific spiritual qualities to each of the four main sections of his book, establishing a structured framework that reflects kabbalistic ideas about divine attributes. These four qualities—strength, salvation, wisdom, and knowledge—provide a comprehensive approach to preparing for death.

[iv] This phrase alludes to Deuteronomy 32:2: 'May my teaching drop as the rain.' The author uses this biblical metaphor to suggest his words will provide spiritual nourishment to his readers, similar to how rain nourishes the earth.

common person are meaningful.[A] A child who holds roses is pure and innocent, for he is among those who have righteous deeds and is presumed pure. And the Rabbis said in Tractate Berakhot, chapter 6, that even small fish are fruitful, multiply, and strengthen a person's entire body. And there in chapter 5, and in Shabbat chapter 21, they said that sometimes the insights of children are sharper.[1]

The days of childhood and youth are vanity,[B] and this is man's portion from God and God's portion in His world, to walk uprightly. Yet how can a faithful shepherd tend to the wind[2] when there is no hope from it? Today there are a hundred like Papi but not one like Rabina.[3] I will consider mankind and examine his creation, and I have found that death is good for him, for the eagles will fly to their nests. And we have eternal salvation in the King's house. As [A] Or: "and do not consider my blessing insignificant in your eyes, for even the words of an ordinary person have value" — This alternative translation maintains the author's humble tone while using slightly different phrasing that might be clearer to modern readers. The phrase 'דמלה דהדיוטא מלה היא' is an idiomatic expression meaning that even words from common people deserve attention.

[B] Or: "The days of childhood and youth are mere breath" — The Hebrew word 'hevel' (הבל) literally means 'breath' or 'vapor' and is often translated as 'vanity' following the King James translation of Ecclesiastes. Translating it as 'mere breath' could better capture the ephemeral quality being emphasized, rather than the modern connotation of 'vanity' as pride.

[1] The author cites this Talmudic teaching to suggest that profound wisdom can come from unexpected sources. This serves both as a humility formula (positioning himself as intellectually modest) and as a justification for readers to take his work seriously despite his self-effacement.

[2] This poetic phrase uses the metaphor of a shepherd (typically representing a religious leader) attempting to tend to something as intangible as wind, suggesting the futility of certain human endeavors.

[3] This is a reference to Talmudic sages, expressing the author's view that contemporary religious authorities are inferior to those of previous generations—a common theme in traditional Jewish literature lamenting spiritual decline.

[i] This is a reference to a Talmudic principle where a child holding roses is considered ritually pure despite potential contact with impurity, because the child is presumed to have plucked them rather than taken them from a cemetery. The author uses this as a metaphor for his own work, suggesting that despite his self-perceived inadequacy, his intentions are pure.

[ii] Cf. Tractate Berakhot — The author cites Talmudic passages about small fish being fruitful and strengthening the body as a metaphor for his own humble work, suggesting that even modest contributions can provide substantial spiritual nourishment. | Cf. Tractate Shabbat — The reference to children's insights being sharper serves to humble the author while simultaneously suggesting that his work, though coming from someone who considers himself lesser than great scholars, may nonetheless contain valuable spiritual insights. | Cf. Jacob's wrestling at the Yabok (Jabbok) River — The title of the book 'Ma'avar Yabok' (Crossing of the Yabok) alludes to this biblical narrative as a metaphor for the soul's transition from this world to the next, with death representing a spiritual wrestling and transformation similar to Jacob's experience.

[iii] This is a reference to the Talmudic statement that compares later generations unfavorably to earlier ones. The phrase means "there are a hundred like Papi but not one like Rabina," referring to Talmudic sages and suggesting intellectual or spiritual decline across generations.

[iv] This Aramaic phrase translates as "for the eagles will fly to their nests," likely symbolizing the soul's return to its divine source after death.

Rabbi Simlai expounded in Tractate Niddah, Chapter 3: "To You every knee shall bow"—this refers to the day of death, as it is said, "Before Him shall bow all who go down to the dust." Therefore, let the heavens rejoice and the earth be glad when the heart of man is in the house of mourning.[1] For what does this joy accomplish? The treasures of the world are thorns and thistles with us, gold pieces are but flies, and roses are weeds,[2] for man's end is to go to his eternal home like a flying and hurried camel.[A] He sees nothing in his hand, like this weasel that drags and deposits things. The sun and light are darkened, and all joy has ceased.[B] Woe to the one who goes and does not return! Woe to the one who departs! Woe to the bundle! Woe from the house! For what is his portion in his house after him? (That is, his dwelling place hidden in his Garden of Eden.[3]) From all the labor he toils for his body and his land. On the day when the keepers of the house tremble,[4] and the strong men are bent, and his dogs do not bark, his grinders do not grind, and his roots are torn like the tearing of a flax wick when it smells fire. The

[A] Or: "like a fluttering, anxious camel" — The Aramaic term 'parcha' can refer to flying but also to fluttering or scattering, while 'taruda' conveys anxiety or distress rather than just hurry. This alternate translation might better capture the sense of disorientation and distress in the metaphor, though camels don't fly in a literal sense in either translation.

[B] Or: "The sun and light grow dark, and all joy turns to evening" — The Hebrew 'v'arvah' (וערבה) plays on the dual meaning of the root ערב which can mean both 'to become evening/dark' and 'to become mixed/confused.' The alternate translation attempts to preserve this wordplay by using 'turns to evening' rather than simply 'ceased.'

[1] The author is making a paradoxical statement that heavens should rejoice when people contemplate mortality in the house of mourning, as this leads to spiritual awakening and proper perspective on life's transience.

[2] This section uses vivid metaphors to convey the worthlessness of worldly treasures when viewed from the perspective of death. The author transforms symbols of wealth and beauty (gold and roses) into symbols of insignificance and decay (flies and weeds).

[3] This parenthetical note refers to the soul's true home in the afterlife, suggesting that while one's earthly house provides no lasting portion, the righteous have an eternal dwelling in Paradise.

[4] This begins an extended metaphorical description of bodily deterioration at death, drawing heavily on imagery from Ecclesiastes chapter 12. In this allegory, the human body is compared to a house falling into disrepair.

[i] This is a quote from Psalms 22:30, which is used here to support the rabbinic interpretation that "every knee shall bow" refers to death, when all living beings must ultimately submit to divine judgment.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase refers to "like a flying and hurried camel," a metaphor for the swiftness and inevitability of death's approach.

[iii] This is a reference to a Talmudic metaphor of a weasel that drags and deposits items in places where they're not useful, symbolizing how humans accumulate possessions that they cannot take with them in death.

[iv] This is an Aramaic lament that translates as "Woe to the one who goes and does not return," referring to the finality of death. The subsequent "woe" statements continue this lament in poetic form.

Woe to those who sell eternal life for momentary existence and their splendid inheritance for a pair of sandals![A] God, who reveals deep things from darkness, sends the watchful eye and listening ear as agents of His providence. They do not deviate in their path, but go wherever the spirit and divine will direct them to go.[B] Therefore, since the day the clear glass ceased and prophecy ended in Israel,[C] God 70R 75R

[A] Or: "Woe to those who sell eternal life for temporal life and their beautiful inheritance for a pair of shoes!" — This is a more literal translation. 'Chayei sha'ah' literally means 'life of the hour' which I rendered as 'temporal life' rather than 'momentary existence.' 'Na'alayim' literally means 'shoes' though 'sandals' would have been the footwear of biblical times being referenced.

[B] Or: "They do not turn aside in their going, and wherever the spirit and supreme will is there to go, they will go" — This alternative is more literal and preserves the biblical cadence of the original Hebrew, which is alluding to Ezekiel's vision of the divine chariot.

[C] Or: "since the day the white glass was nullified and prophecy ceased from Israel" — The phrase 'zechuchit levanah' (white or clear glass) is a rabbinic metaphor for prophecy. My original translation conveys the meaning, but this alternative is more literal about the glass being 'nullified' rather than 'ceased.'

[1] This phrase and the following references to "natural heat" reflect medieval medical concepts about the body's vital fluids and warmth being depleted at death.

[2] The final line creates a powerful contrast between the physical body (represented by the reddening bone) and the departing soul, capturing the moment of separation at death.

[i] This is an allusion to Ecclesiastes 12:3, which metaphorically describes the physical deterioration of the aging body, where "keepers of the house" refers to the limbs and "strong men" to the legs.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase refers to "his dogs do not bark, his grinders do not grind," continuing the Ecclesiastes metaphor where the "dogs" may refer to the voice that fails and the "grinders" to teeth that can no longer chew.

[iii] This is a direct quote from Ecclesiastes 12:7, referring to the body's return to dust at death, while in the biblical verse, it continues with "and the spirit returns to God who gave it."

[iv] This Aramaic phrase means "the exchange for beauty is pain," reflecting on how the beauty of life is ultimately replaced by the pain of death and decay.

[v] Cf. Ecclesiastes 12:1-7 — The author draws heavily on Ecclesiastes' poetic description of bodily deterioration at death, adopting its household metaphors while adding medical and mystical elements. This biblical foundation gives authority to the author's meditation on mortality. | Cf. Talmud Niddah — By citing this Talmudic interpretation, the author establishes the inevitability of death as a form of ultimate submission to divine authority, framing mortality within religious tradition rather than as a merely physical phenomenon. | Cf. Psalms 22:30 — The author uses this biblical verse to reinforce the connection between death and submission to divine judgment, creating a scriptural foundation for viewing mortality as the ultimate acknowledgment of God's sovereignty. | Cf. Zohar — The Aramaic phrases and mystical concepts about souls returning to their nests reflect Zoharic teachings about the afterlife journey, suggesting the author is incorporating kabbalistic perspectives on death alongside biblical and Talmudic sources.

speaks to people in one way, and in a second way if they do not repent and take the first communication to heart.[1] Perhaps they will heed the voice of the latter sign, for truly the ear tests words. From the beginning, in secret, the God of the spirits of all flesh speaks to a person in dreams and warns them, saying: "Live! Be righteous and do not be wicked! Let your soul not depart from its prison defiled with sins, like Canaanite slaves who leave bearing physical blemishes, both major and minor."[A]

Behold, Scripture proclaims loudly, saying "Dreams speak falsely," yet it also shouts and illuminates with holy flames, and from His heavenly dwelling He gives a powerful voice declaring that dreams speak to and inform people of the falsehood and deception they have done, so that their hearts might understand, repent, and be healed. This is what Elihu also spoke of: "In a dream, a vision of the night, when deep sleep falls upon people, then He opens the ears of people." Sometimes the dream threatens a person—this is what "He seals with their instruction" means. All this is to turn a person away from wrongdoing and from arrogance, which is a hard shell of pride that covers a person.[B]

The Rashba wrote in section 483: "Regarding the dream you asked me about, although they said

[A] Or: "And let not your soul exit from its imprisonment defiled with sins like the exit of Canaanite slaves with damaged limbs and blemishes, both great and small" — This more literal translation preserves the reference to 'rashei evarim' (tips of limbs/extremities), which refers to the biblical law where a slave could go free if their master damaged their extremities.

[B] Or: "and from the body, which is a hard shell from pride, he will hide from man" — The term 'gevah' could refer to either 'arrogance' or 'body.' The passage is discussing klipot (shells) in a kabbalistic sense, so the body as a 'shell' is plausible, though I believe the context supports the interpretation of pride/arrogance.

[1] This passage draws from Job 33:14, where Elihu explains God speaks in various ways to warn people. The author is establishing a progressive model of divine communication: first gentle warnings through dreams, then more severe signs if the initial warnings are ignored.

[i] The "white glass" or "clear glass" refers to prophecy in rabbinic literature. This metaphor suggests that prophecy provided clear divine communication, like looking through transparent glass, but this clarity ended with the cessation of prophecy in the post-biblical period.

[ii] This reference alludes to the biblical law (Exodus 21:26-27) where a Canaanite slave could go free if their master damaged their eye, tooth, or other extremity. The author creatively adapts this to describe the soul leaving its bodily "prison" at death, suggesting that sins are like physical blemishes that damage the soul's spiritual state.

[iii] The author cleverly resolves the apparent contradiction in Zechariah 10:2 which states "dreams speak falsely" by reinterpreting it to mean that dreams reveal to people the falsehood and deception they have committed, thus serving as a divine wake-up call for repentance.

[iv] The Rashba (Rabbi Solomon ben Adret, 1235-1310) was one of the most important medieval rabbinical authorities. His responsum (legal opinion) cited here is being used to support the author's position that while dreams generally shouldn't be given legal weight, particularly striking or prophetic dreams might warrant serious consideration.

[1] The author uses the Rashba's responsum to establish a nuanced approach to dreams: while most shouldn't be taken literally, dreams with particularly striking content or that have proven accurate deserve serious consideration as potential divine messages.

[2] This interpretation of the Talmudic statement "dream matters neither elevate nor lower" limits its application to financial disputes rather than dismissing dreams entirely. The author's explanation shows how rabbinic statements that seem to dismiss dreams can be reconciled with other traditions that take dreams seriously as divine communication.

[i] Cf. Book of Job 33:14-18 — The author directly references Elihu's statement from Job that God speaks to humans through dreams when they are sleeping deeply. This biblical passage is central to the author's argument that dreams serve as divine communication meant to warn people away from sin. | Cf. Talmud Berakhot 10b — The author cites this talmudic passage to demonstrate that even when dreams predict death, one should still pray for divine mercy. This supports his argument that dreams should be taken seriously as potential divine warnings while still maintaining hope for divine intervention. | Cf. Responsa of the Rashba 483 — The author quotes Rabbi Solomon ben Adret (Rashba) to provide rabbinic precedent for taking certain dreams seriously, particularly those that have proven accurate in the past or contain especially striking content, despite the general rabbinic stance that dreams are not legally binding. | Cf. Zechariah 11:12 — The opening phrase about selling eternal life for shoes alludes to the prophet Zechariah's imagery of something valuable being sold for a paltry sum (thirty pieces of silver), which was later connected to Judas' betrayal of Jesus in Christian tradition. The author adapts this imagery to contrast eternal spiritual value against temporary material gain. | Cf. Ezekiel 1:12 — The phrase about not turning aside and going where the spirit directs clearly alludes to Ezekiel's vision of the divine chariot, whose wheels moved directly without turning and went wherever the spirit directed them. The author uses this to describe divine providence and its agents that move according to God's will.

a person gradually as atonement for guilt.[1] At first, he experiences discomforts and pains without fever,[A] such as headache, heart pain, or heaviness in his other limbs. Yet his strength remains intact in his bones, as it is written, "He is chastened with pain upon his bed, but the multitude of his bones are firm." Even if he is seized with weakness, as we say in Gittin chapter 7, "One who drinks poor white wine, it seizes him with weakness," nevertheless he still maintains his vigor.

(And one who falls ill on the first day should not reveal it, so that his mazal [fortune] will not be harmed. This was Rava's practice, as mentioned in Tractate Berakhot. A person should be careful in all his actions not to damage his mazal,[2] as we say in Tractate Kritot, chapter 1: "One who wishes to know if he will complete the year successfully should light a lamp during the ten days between the New Year and the Day of Atonement in a room where no wind blows; if the light extends well, he will know that he will complete the year successfully. One who wishes to engage in business and wants to know if his business will prosper should raise a chicken; if it grows fat, he will know his business will prosper. One who wishes to go on a journey and wants to know if he will return home should stand in the house of his friend; if they see the shadow of a shadow, he will know that he will return, and if they do not see the shadow of a shadow, he will know that he will not return home." The Talmud concludes there:

[A] Or: "Initially, discomforts and pains without fever befall him" — This alternative translation preserves the passive voice of the Hebrew phrase 'יאונה אליו' (befall him) rather than making it active. This might better reflect the author's view that these sufferings come upon a person from an external source (God) rather than arising from within.

[1] The author presents a theology of suffering where illness serves as divine correction rather than random misfortune. This progressive model of illness as spiritual purification is central to the book's approach to end-of-life care.

[2] The concept of 'mazal' here refers to one's spiritual fortune or destiny. The parenthetical section explores the relationship between psychological state (worry, fear) and spiritual wellbeing, suggesting that certain divination practices can actually harm one's spiritual state rather than protect it.

[i] This is a reference to Job 33:19, which discusses divine chastisement through physical suffering. The author is quoting scripture to establish that the initial stages of illness still leave one's fundamental strength intact.

[ii] The reference to 'poor white wine' comes from Talmudic medicine, where certain foods and drinks were believed to affect health in specific ways. Here, the author uses this example to illustrate a minor ailment that doesn't fully incapacitate a person.

[iii] This parenthetical section refers to Talmudic practices regarding illness and fortune. The belief was that revealing illness on the first day could damage one's mazal (spiritual fortune). The section contains several folk practices and omens that the author ultimately recommends against.

"But this is not a reliable matter; one should not do this, lest he see a bad sign, cause himself distress, and damage his mazal." Thus, fear, distress, and worry harm one's fortune. And in chapter Helek, regarding the source for complainers in the Torah, Rashi explains: "When a person informs another of his troubles, he should say, 'May this not come upon you as it has come upon me,' for it is difficult to hear about troubles, as sometimes they return upon the listener, and one who is particular about this is not guilty of superstitious practice. Another interpretation: 'against' is translated as 'complain,' like a person who says to his friend, 'I am not speaking against him.'" Rashi further comments that worry affects even one's Torah study: "A person's anxiety about his livelihood causes him to forget his learning.") 155R 160R 165R 170R

If these discomforts do not suffice to return him [to the right path], nor allow him to regain his composure, a mild fever is added, and his soul abhors all food. This is the meaning of "his soul abhors bread, and his appetite dainty food." This fever benefits the soul like an antidote benefits the body.[A] And if he still does not return to the One who smites him, he is surrounded by a fire of the bones[B] that destroys the appearance of his flesh. This is the meaning of "his flesh is consumed away that it cannot be seen, and his bones that were not seen stick out." This burning fever resembles a time of danger, as we say in Pesachim, chapter 2. And if he still hardens his heart in wickedness, the illness intensifies with a storm of sensations, as the humors overpower him, especially the white phlegm, and he stands between life and death. This is the meaning of "his soul draws near to the pit, and his life to those who bring death." Even in this state, when he is at the crushing point of his soul,[1] if there is for him an interceding angel, 175R 180R 185R 190R

[A] Or: "This fever is beneficial to the soul as theriac is to the body" — The term 'תרייקא' (triaca/theriac) refers specifically to a historical medicinal compound used as an antidote to poisons. Using the specific historical term might better convey the medical understanding of the period.

[B] Or: "And if he still does not repent to the One who strikes him, he will be encircled by a burning heat in his bones" — This alternative clarifies that 'שב' here means 'repent' rather than simply 'return,' capturing the religious dimension of the text. It also translates the Aramaic phrase 'חרם דאשא דגרמי' more explicitly as referring to the burning sensation in the bones during high fever.

[1] The Hebrew phrase 'דכדוכה של נפש' (crushing of the soul) conveys the extreme spiritual and [i] This is a reference to Job 33:20, continuing the scriptural framework that structures this entire discussion of progressive illness.

[ii] This quotes Job 33:21, describing the wasting away of flesh during severe illness, as the author continues to use Job's description of suffering as a framework for his explanation.

one of a thousand, he will be healed and return to the days of his youth; and if he entreats God, He will be favorable to him and grant him salvation.

As we say in Tractate Avodah Zarah, chapter 4, afflictions are faithful to their oath not to depart except on a specific day, at a specific hour, through a specific person, and by means of a specific remedy. All these circumstances are arranged by the Holy One, blessed be He, for one who does not set his ways right in this world, in order to exempt his soul from passing through the pit, which is Gehenna, and so that his life-force, which is the soul, may see the light.[1] Indeed, God does all these things two or three times with a man, to bring back his soul from the pit, to the world of souls, to be illuminated with the light of life in the world of resurrection.[2] physical distress at this final stage of illness, yet the author emphasizes that divine mercy remains possible even at this point.

[1] Here the author reveals the ultimate purpose of divinely ordained suffering: it serves as a purification process that can spare the soul from more severe punishment after death and prepare it for spiritual elevation.

[2] The passage concludes with a reference to Jewish eschatology—the belief in the world of souls (olam haneshamot) as an intermediate state after death, and the eventual resurrection of the dead (techiyat hametim) when souls will be reunited with transformed bodies.

[i] This is a reference to Job 33:22, describing the nearness to death in the most severe stage of illness.

[ii] This quotes Job 33:23-25, describing the intercession of an angel and the possibility of recovery even from severe illness.

[iii] This Talmudic teaching personifies sufferings as having their own will and oath, emphasizing that illness has a divinely ordained purpose and timeframe.

[iv] This quotes Job 33:29, bringing the scriptural framework full circle by showing that God's purpose in sending affliction is ultimately redemptive—to save the soul from the pit of destruction.

out sin. And although in Shabbat chapter 5, Rabbi Ami and Rav Asi who said this were refuted, nevertheless, the Holy One, blessed be He, is certainly not suspected of executing judgment without justice. Therefore, they said in Tractate Berakhot: "If a person sees that sufferings are coming upon him, he should examine his deeds." And whoever regularly contends with his evil inclination and weakens it prevents illnesses from entering his house,[1] as we say in Berakhot chapter 6: "Stay up late to repair your soul and rise early to repair your soul."[A] And whoever sacrifices his evil inclination honors his Creator in two worlds.[2] 210R 215R 220R

And Rabbi Lakish said: "A covenant is mentioned regarding salt,[3] and a covenant is mentioned regarding sufferings,"[4] etc. And because of them [sufferings], a person becomes favored before God, as we learn in Sifrei: "As long as a person dwells in tranquility, none of his sins are atoned for." And one who sets out on a journey before the rooster's crow, his blood is on his own head, for initially there is darkness and afterward comes light. And through sufferings, he becomes favorable before God, as it is written: "For whom the Lord loves, He rebukes." And similarly at the end of the first chapter of Kiddushin something like this appears. 225R 230R 235R

And sufferings are kindness to a person, as is found in the Gemara, the Pesikta, and the Mekhilta: "The Holy One, blessed be He, said to David: 'If you

[A] Or: "staying up late and rising early to attend to your soul's rectification" — This Aramaic phrase from Berakhot would be more clearly expressed as a continuous thought about spiritual discipline at both ends of the day, rather than as two separate actions.

[1] This reflects the common rabbinic belief that spiritual discipline has direct effects on physical wellbeing, a theme central to Ma'avar Yabok's approach to illness.

[2] The 'two worlds' refer to this world (olam hazeh) and the world to come (olam haba), reflecting the Jewish belief that proper spiritual conduct has consequences in both realms.

[3] This refers to Numbers 18:19 where God made an 'eternal covenant of salt' with Aaron and his descendants, using salt as a symbol of permanence and preservation.

[4] The parallel between salt and suffering suggests that just as salt preserves food, sufferings preserve the soul by purifying it from sin.

And they said in Tractate Arakhin chapter 3: "Anyone who passes forty days without sufferings has received his [entire] world." Therefore, Rabbi Eleazar son of Rabbi Shimon (in the chapter Ha-Po'alim) would say to sufferings in the evening: "Come, my brothers and friends." And similarly, Rabbi [Judah the Prince][1] accepted sufferings upon himself for thirteen years, as did Nahum Ish Gam Zu,[2] as mentioned in the chapter on the Order of Fasts. And in the chapter Helek, it is said that when Rabbi Akiva turned and said to Rabbi Yohanan ben Zakkai: "Beloved are sufferings that atone for you," he said to them: "Support me so I may hear the words of Akiva ben Joseph my student, who said: 'Beloved are sufferings.'" 245R 250R 255R

And behold, the herald calls out and the hand writes that sufferings, illnesses, and pains are a warning to sinners, for "the discipline of kings opens for them the bonds of wickedness," as we learn in the chapter Helek about Manasseh, regarding whom it is written: "And Manasseh knew that the Lord is God." And for a man whose way is hidden, God will provide him with ways to find Him when He fills him with bitterness. And his sufferings testify to his sin, and the sin that will be buried with his children.[A] That is to say, a person does not stub his toe below unless it is announced about him from above. 260R 265R 270R

[A] Or: "His sufferings testify to his sins, and sins that will be buried with his children" — This Aramaic expression is difficult to render precisely, but the alternate translation better captures the idea that sins have consequences across generations.

[1] This refers to Rabbi Judah the Prince (Yehuda HaNasi), the compiler of the Mishnah, who according to the Talmud suffered for thirteen years and accepted his afflictions as spiritually beneficial.

[2] Nahum Ish Gam Zu was a Talmudic sage known for his extreme acceptance of suffering, always saying 'This too (gam zu) is for the best' about his misfortunes.

[ii] Abbreviation for 'Rabbi Eleazar son of Rabbi Shimon,' a Talmudic sage who was known to have endured great physical suffering.

[iii] An Aramaic expression from the Book of Daniel (5:5) alluding to divine judgment, literally 'the herald calls out and the hand writes.'

Surely we know, if we have not heard, from a holy mouth speaking great things like the sound of horn and flute,[2] namely the fountain of wisdom, Rabbi 295R Shimon bar Yochai, in Parashat Ha'azinu on the verse "He found him in a desert land, and in the

[A] Or: "like one who is intoxicated and falls of his own accord" — The Aramaic idiom is more elegantly expressed with this alternate wording, which preserves the metaphor while making it more accessible.

[1] This metaphor suggests using one's divine soul as an illuminating force to examine one's sins and imperfections, similar to how one would use light to search for leaven before Passover.

[2] The original uses Aramaic terminology ('karna mashrokita') found in the Book of Daniel, referring to musical instruments. This poetic description emphasizes the spiritual authority and eloquence of Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai.

[i] A metaphor using leaven (חמץ) and sourdough (שאור) to represent sin and spiritual impurity that must be identified and removed. This imagery comes from Passover rituals of removing leaven.

[ii] Cf. Job 5:17 — The author uses this verse as scriptural proof that suffering should be viewed as divine correction rather than arbitrary punishment, reinforcing the theological framework of the entire passage. | Cf. Berakhot 5a — This direct quote from the Talmud establishes the rabbinic basis for interpreting suffering as a call to introspection and repentance, which is a central theme of the entire passage. | Cf. Proverbs 6:23 — The author uses this verse to support the claim that suffering and correction are necessary components of a spiritual life leading to salvation. | Cf. 2 Chronicles 33:13 — This biblical reference serves as a powerful example of how suffering can lead even the most sinful person (Manasseh was known for his idolatry) to spiritual recognition and repentance.

[iii] This is a poetic description using Aramaic phrases to describe Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai. It literally means 'a holy mouth speaking great things like the sound of horn and flute,' employing biblical language from Daniel 3:5 where musical instruments are mentioned.

[iv] H"H is an abbreviation for 'that is' (הלא הוא), and RSB"Y is an acronym for Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, the traditional author of the Zohar, the central text of Jewish mysticism.

waste howling wilderness; He encircled him, He instructed him, etc." who said in his commentary: "A wise physician must attend to the sick person; if he can provide healing for the body, that is appropriate. But if he does not strive for the healing of the soul, then it is the Holy One, blessed be He, who will attend to him in this world and in the world to come." And he brought a story from the book of that Arab merchant, see there. Also in Parashat Beshalach, page 61, it is written: "When a person lies in his sickness, he is seized by the King's officers, his head in a collar, his feet in stocks, many forces guard him from this side and that side, all his limbs are in distress, battling with one another, and food is removed from him. At that time, they appoint an advocate to teach merit for him before the King, as it is written: 'If there be for him an angel, an intercessor, one among a thousand.' Fortunate is the portion of the person who enters to him and teaches him Torah to save him from judgment, as it is written: 'Happy is he who considers the poor.' And how can one restore him, to teach him the ways of life, to return him before his Master? Therefore it is called 'visiting the sick' because one must urge him to examine and search his ways and paths.[1] And this is certainly as weighty for him as his entire learning." And it is written in Parashat Pekudei that on the western side in the holy chambers, there is one of those called "companions" who is appointed over those who attend to the sick,[2] that they should examine their deeds and return in repentance, as is expounded there and in other places. May the words of God make us hear this encouragement. And if to add days or hours to a life of little value, how many drinks did he consume

[1] The author presents a creative interpretation of the Hebrew term 'bikur cholim' (visiting the sick), connecting it to the root meaning 'examination' or 'investigation'. While not linguistically accurate, this wordplay reinforces the spiritual purpose of the visit: to encourage self-examination and repentance.

[2] The text refers to a mystical concept from the Zohar where spiritual entities ('companions') in the heavenly chambers are responsible for overseeing those who visit the sick on earth, creating a cosmic dimension to this mitzvah (religious obligation).

[i] This refers to a story in the Zohar about an Arab merchant ('tayya' in Aramaic). 'Y"Sh' is an abbreviation for 'see there' (יעויין שם), directing the reader to consult the original source.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase from the Zohar uses metaphors of physical restraint to describe the spiritual condition of the sick person. It describes them as 'seized by the King's officers, head in a collar, feet in stocks,' portraying illness as a form of divine judgment.

[iii] The author offers a creative etymology for the term 'bikur cholim' (visiting the sick), connecting it to the Hebrew word for 'examination' (bikur/investigation), suggesting that the visitor should encourage the sick person to examine their deeds. This is a homiletical rather than literal etymology.

from Passover to Shavuot,[1] and to make a remedy for temporal life, how many medicines to heal in its time? What should one do to remove the stains of his soul and give it eternal life by making it white as snow? And what will be the reward for such a physician? "In the day of evil, the Lord will deliver him."[2] This means: on the day that evil rules to take his soul, the Lord will deliver him. And since "grace is in the lips of the wise, and healing is in the tongue of the wise," he will arouse him to return in repentance, both generally and specifically. 335R 340R

[1]This refers to remedies or treatments taken during the period of counting the Omer (the 49 days between these festivals). The author is making a rhetorical contrast between the extensive efforts made for physical healing versus the often-neglected spiritual healing.

[2]This continues the quotation from Psalms 41:2 that began with 'Happy is he who considers the poor.' The author interprets this specifically as divine protection during one's own time of death or judgment, suggesting that those who properly visit the sick will receive mercy during their own final moments.

[i]This refers to the Jewish custom of counting the days between Passover and Shavuot (the counting of the Omer). The author is making a rhetorical point about how much effort people put into physical remedies during this period compared to spiritual ones.

[ii]This is a quote from Psalms 41:2, which continues the verse beginning with 'Happy is he who considers the poor' cited earlier. The author interprets 'the day of evil' specifically as the day of death when divine judgment occurs.

[iii]Cf. Zohar, Parashat Ha'azinu — The Zohar is used here to establish the primary theological framework that proper medical care requires attention to both physical and spiritual healing. This reference provides authoritative backing for the book's central premise. | Cf. Zohar, Parashat Beshalach — This extended Zohar reference portrays illness as a form of divine judgment and the sick person as spiritually imprisoned. It establishes the critical importance of those who visit and teach Torah to the sick as their spiritual advocates before the divine court. | Cf. Psalms 41:2 — This biblical verse is used to support the religious obligation of visiting the sick, suggesting that the 'poor' in this context refers to the ill person who is impoverished in health and requires spiritual guidance. | Cf. Zohar, Parashat Pekudei — This reference establishes a cosmic dimension to visiting the sick, suggesting that there are heavenly appointees who oversee this mitzvah, particularly ensuring that visitors encourage the sick to examine their deeds and repent. | Cf. Psalms 41:2 — This verse is interpreted to mean that one who properly attends to the sick will be delivered by God on their own day of judgment or death, establishing a spiritual reciprocity for this mitzvah. | Cf. Proverbs 12:18 — This reference supports the idea that the wise words of those visiting the sick have healing power, connecting physical recovery with spiritual guidance through speech.

derstanding about how to view the sufferings that come upon him, placing his hope in the Lord his God. For it is pleasing to the righteous to break themselves[A] and to join brokenness upon brokenness,[1] with everything directed toward the Lord their 350R
God, as it is written: "For Your sake we are killed all day long" and "For Your sake I have borne reproach," as explained in Parashat Vayakhel page 198 and Parashat Terumah page 159.

This is because human skin was formed from the 355R skin of the serpent in place of the garments of light that humans originally possessed. Even human flesh is the serpent's portion and flesh of its flesh, as they interpreted regarding the verse about "the fool" who is Samael—when he was still in heaven, he rebelled 360R against his master, folding his arms and consuming his own flesh.[B]

Therefore, when the human body is purified through suffering, the powers of the external forces are weakened, as the verse states: "a time when man 365R rules over man to his hurt." See the explanation of this verse in the Zohar, Parashat Shelach page 172b, where they said that the Angel of Death does not rejoice when he kills a person,[2] but rather appears joyful in order to fulfill the will of the Holy One, 370R Blessed be He, as it is written: "the stormy wind fulfilling His word."

As the external forces are weakened through human suffering, the holy judgments are also sweetened[3] and return to their sheaths above to be 375R fragrant. In this way, a person offers his body as a sacrifice to God, as we say in Parashat Noah page 61a: "A righteous person is literally a sacrifice for atonement." This is also mentioned at the end of Parashat Pekudei and in Parashat Toldot, which 380R states: "When the body is weakened, the soul

[A] Or: "the righteous willingly accept their own suffering" — This Aramaic phrase could be rendered more idiomatically to capture the concept that righteous individuals willingly accept suffering rather than the more literal 'breaking themselves.'

[B] Or: "he eats from what is his own" — This Aramaic phrase is more literally translated in the alternate version, which preserves the wordplay in the original that suggests Samael ultimately harms himself through his rebellion.

[1] This poetic phrase ("לאתחברא תבירו על תבירו" in the original) expresses how the righteous accept and even embrace successive afflictions as spiritually beneficial.

[2] The Hebrew acronym "מ״ה" refers to the Angel of Death (Malach HaMavet). This passage explains that even when executing divine judgment, the Angel of Death only appears joyful as part of fulfilling divine will, not out of actual pleasure in human suffering.

[3] In Kabbalistic terminology, "sweetening the judgments" (המתקת הדינים) refers to the process of transforming severe divine judgments into mercy or more balanced justice through spiritual actions.

dominates,"[A] and therefore "the righteous one is tested." Even the chosen one among the Patriarchs [Jacob] requested mercy and became weakened.

This is the meaning of "those who hope in the 385R
Lord shall renew their strength"—even though righteous Torah scholars have weakened bodily powers, this is because they exchange the strength that should have gone to the body and give it to the soul. This is why the Torah is called "tushiyah" 390R (wisdom/substance) because it weakens (matesheth) the powers of the evil inclination, which are material powers.

The primary nourishment for those who engage in Torah study for its own sake is to satisfy their souls, 395R to enjoy the holy spirituality that is concealed and clothed in their bread and in the wine they drink, such that the soul is nourished by the essence while the body is nourished by the residue. Additionally, the nourishment of the wise flows to them from a high 400R place in heaven, which primarily feeds the soul and the body only incidentally, as explained in Parashat Beshalach and other places in the Zohar.

Therefore, those who hope in the Lord, through the power of this nourishment, "will soar on wings 405R like eagles"[1] after their death. They will go and not grow weary from the angels of destruction, because they desired in this world to fulfill the will of their Creator. They will not tire from material powers, for they subdued these in their lifetime for the service 410R of their Creator. In this way, each righteous person merits their own dwelling place according to the merit of their deeds, as stated in the Midrash Ruth, page 33a.

[A] Or: "When the body is broken down, the soul gains supremacy" — This alternative translation more strongly conveys the power dynamic between body and soul that is central to the text's mystical teaching about suffering.

[1] This is a reference to Isaiah 40:31, which the author interprets as referring to the souls of the righteous after death, suggesting they will have spiritual strength to overcome the angels of destruction they encounter.

[i] Cf. Zohar, Vayakhel — The text cites this passage of the Zohar to support its claim that human skin is derived from the serpent's nature, replacing the original spiritual garments of light. | Cf. Zohar, Shelach — This reference explains the paradoxical nature of the Angel of Death, who appears joyful when fulfilling divine judgment but doesn't actually rejoice in human death. | Cf. Zohar, Noah — This source supports the concept that a righteous person's suffering serves as a sacrifice for atonement, much like temple offerings in earlier times. | Cf. Isaiah 40:31 — The author reinterprets this well-known verse to explain how the physical weakness of Torah scholars is actually a spiritual exchange, where bodily strength is transferred to strengthen the soul. | Cf. Midrash Ruth — This reference supports the teaching that each righteous person receives an individual dwelling place in the afterlife based on their specific deeds and merits.

From the story of Rabbi [Judah the Prince], where 415R they said that we respond to the fool[A] who says he wants to see his friends in their glory in the world of souls,[1] saying to him: "Fool! In the world [to come] we are commanded by the Almighty that the wicked shall not stand beside the righteous, nor 420R the righteous beside the wicked,[2] nor the impure beside the pure," etc. And there are those who adorn and prepare their dwelling in the Garden of Eden in a brief moment, like the story of Yokim of Tzeroroth.[B] And the words of repentance of a 425R dying person are considered as if they were written and delivered above,[C] and he need not say "write them down," because our merciful God thinks good thoughts about him, to give him a future and a good hope, so that his mind will not be distracted and 430R his soul [delivered] into the hands of cruel angels.
Moreover, a person does not deceive himself about doing complete repentance in his heart at the time of death, when an additional spirit is within him, as it is written "You take away their breath, they expire" 435R (Psalm 104:29), and a single self-admonishment in a person's heart is better than a hundred lashes.[3]

Therefore, from the day I gained understanding, my thoughts have troubled me and my thoughts

[A] Or: "From the story of Rabbi [Judah HaNasi], where they said that we answer the fool" — The alternate translation uses 'HaNasi' which is more commonly used in English scholarship to refer to Rabbi Judah the Prince, and uses 'answer' instead of 'respond' which is slightly more direct.

[B] Or: "And there are those who adorn and establish their home in the Garden of Eden in a brief moment, as in the story of Yakum ben Tzerorot" — The alternative offers a different transliteration of the name (Yakum instead of Yokim) which may be more accurate to the original pronunciation, and uses 'establish' for 'motiv' which might better capture the sense of setting up residence.

[C] Or: "And the words of repentance of a shechiv mera (deathly ill person) are considered as if they were written and transmitted above" — The alternate includes the technical term 'shechiv mera' which is the rabbinic legal term for a person who is deathly ill, and uses 'transmitted' for 'mesurin' which might be more precise in this context.

[1] The Hebrew 'olam haneshamot' refers to the spiritual realm where souls reside after death, an important concept in Jewish mystical teachings about the afterlife.

[2] This reflects the Jewish theological concept of the separation of the righteous and wicked in the afterlife, based on biblical and rabbinic sources.

[3] This is a rabbinic saying emphasizing the superior value of internal repentance over external punishment.

[i] This refers to a story about Rabbi Judah the Prince (Rabbi Yehuda HaNasi), who compiled the Mishnah around 200 CE. The text is drawing on rabbinic traditions about his teachings.

[ii] This appears to reference a rabbinic story about Yokim (or Yakum) ben Tzerorot who earned his place in the World to Come through a single meritorious action. The text uses this as evidence that one can prepare one's eternal dwelling even in a brief moment.

[iii] The abbreviation ש״מ stands for 'shechiv mera', a halakhic term for a person who is deathly ill, whose legal status differs from both a healthy person and a deceased person.

[iv] This is a quote from Psalm 104:29: "You take away their breath, they expire." The author is using this verse to support his point about spiritual awareness at the time of death.

have answered me: "Woe heavens!" At this every wise person would be astonished. My soul has loathed my life—why should the spark of our fire labor and our light be extinguished, heaven forbid, as if in the blackest darkness, with no light of Torah shining upon it? And since everything that begins ends, and all faces are equal, and our days are like a shadow on the earth, why should our end not greatly increase in the Torah of light? Woe to us who die like a fool, except for a few precious individuals of limited number—so few they are considered nullified—who possess strength and wisdom, for their appointed duty preserved their spirit through their ordered words at a time when their feet were not placed in stocks. And if, heaven forbid, a scourge should make one ill and suddenly kill, and it shall be the same for people and priests, his flesh shall suffer and his soul shall mourn. Why should the living person, who resembles an angel, not take to heart while still in his prime, before the day of confusion comes, that every disease will take root in all his extremities? If only it would not increase further, as each day he goes backward, not forward. 440R 445R 450R 455R 460R

Destruction and ruin consume him when he could be looking ahead from the beginning of thought to the end of action, leaving a blessing for his soul after him. And how much more so if he merits [this] for himself and for others with him, and also ascends to be counted among those who make the multitudes righteous, who shine like stars by performing true kindness with the living and the d[1]ead. And his light will shine like a lamp within the congregation and assembly in the heavenly academy, by committing to writing the laws of unification, purification, and sanctification. [1]The Hebrew 'chesed shel emet' (true kindness) is often used specifically for kindness shown to the dead, as they cannot repay the favor—making it the purest form of kindness.

[2]This may refer to the Angel of Death or evil forces that might interfere with proper preparation for death.

[i]An abbreviation for 'chas v'shalom' (Heaven forbid), a common expression used when mentioning something negative or undesirable.

[ii]This is an allusion to Daniel 12:3: "Those who lead many to righteousness will shine like the stars forever and ever." The author is describing the merit of helping others prepare properly for death.

[iii]The author appears to be describing the merit of recording sacred teachings about spiritual unity, purity, and holiness—which is precisely what his book Ma'avar Yabok aims to do. This is a self-reference to the purpose of his work.

Go and do so, for the bearer of the letter should be its deliverer. 485R Please listen to my voice; I will counsel you. For you are like a precious vineyard in the desert, as we say in the first chapter of Tractate Rosh Hashanah. And take to heart what they said in the Midrash Proverbs: Rabbi Abin bar Kahana said, 'If you 490R thought to perform a commandment but did not do it, it is better for you to place a muzzle on your mouth rather than to make a promise and not fulfill it.' And elsewhere they said, 'A person should always make himself like a ship's captain,[2] figuring 495R out how to perform a commandment, especially acts

[A] Or: "And if it is possible to complete its service under your protection" — This Aramaic phrase is difficult to translate precisely. The alternate offers 'service' for 'sheroteih' which might be more accurate than 'beginning', and interprets 'under your wings' as 'under your protection' which clarifies the metaphorical meaning.

[B] Or: "And I said to my heart: "Why are you dormant?" — This translation more directly reflects the Hebrew phrase 'אל לבי' (to my heart) and uses 'dormant' as an alternative to 'slumbering' that might better capture the sense of spiritual inactivity.

[1] The author uses vivid metaphorical language comparing disease to stinging insects and connects this to the talmudic tractate Uktzin (Stems/Stings), creating a wordplay that links physical suffering with spiritual teachings.

[2] The metaphor of a ship's captain (קברניט) suggests someone who takes initiative and navigates through challenges to achieve a worthy goal, particularly in relation to performing commandments.

[i] This Aramaic phrase uses the metaphor of protection 'under wings' which appears frequently in biblical and rabbinic literature, especially in reference to divine protection. Here it likely refers to divine assistance in completing the work.

[ii] Cf. Talmud, Berakhot 28b — The author alludes to a rabbinic story about someone who earned his place in the afterlife in a brief moment, using this as evidence that deathbed repentance can be effective. | Cf. Talmud, Shabbat 153a — The author draws on talmudic concepts about deathbed confessions and their efficacy, supporting his argument that one should prepare for death through proper spiritual activities. | Cf. Psalm 104:29 — The author uses this verse to support the idea that at death, an additional spiritual awareness comes to a person, making deathbed repentance more likely to be sincere. | Cf. Daniel 12:3 — The author draws on this biblical image to describe those who help others prepare for death properly as 'making the multitudes righteous' who will 'shine like stars'—connecting his work to this sacred biblical mission. | Cf. Zohar on the soul's journey after death — This entire passage mirrors Zoharic concerns with proper preparation for death and the soul's destiny afterward, suggesting the author is drawing on kabbalistic frameworks for understanding death and the afterlife.

[iii] This is an Aramaic expression meaning "the one who reads the letter should be its messenger," suggesting that the person who proposes an idea should be the one to implement it.

[iv] The author references the Talmudic teaching (Rosh Hashanah 4a) that a vineyard in the desert is especially precious because it is rare and difficult to maintain, using this as a metaphor for the spiritual value of his work.

of kindness, for it is among the ten things that are called “life”[1] and merit taking shelter under the wings of the Holy One, blessed be He.’ As we say in the Midrash Ruth, ‘Great is the power of those who perform acts of kindness, for they shelter not in the shadow of the earth, etc., but only under the wings of the Holy One, blessed be He.’ And in the Pesikta they say, ‘If your friend encounters a day of trouble, see that you perform kindness with him.’ 500R 505R

Yet in a moment, as quickly as it was said, I retracted and turned back, for my kidneys admonished me[2] and the thoughts of my heart within me rebuked me: ‘Woe to the ears that hear such things! Turn to your right or to your left and do not add another word in this matter. Even speech is forbidden to you! For how can a tiny fly with clipped wings lord it over others? Are you worthy to teach Torah? Drawing water from the river is like garden waste! Lest you become an object of contempt and plunder to anyone of clear mind—like one who tries to push an elephant through the eye of a needle! Peering through the cracks of understanding at the sayings of the Tannaim and Amoraim, at sermons and legends—anyone accustomed to investigating secrets will raise his voice against you like a serpent and roar at you: “Is Saul also among the prophets?[3] What is this to the son of Kish? Kish, kish” (a mere trifle). The matter depends on reasoning, and who has brought a drunkard among the Nazirites? He speaks at the gates, but who is this who makes the clouds his chariot, and what is his strength and his might? And I know and testify that there is no spirit within him—no eye makeup, no rouge, no adornment,[A] and 510R 515R 520R 525R

[A] Or: “neither cosmetics, nor paint, nor beautification” — This alternate translation uses more general terms for cosmetic enhancement that might be more accessible to modern readers, though the original translation more precisely captures the specific ancient beauty treatments referenced.

[1] This refers to a rabbinic list of things that provide or sustain life in both physical and spiritual senses, including Torah, rain, and acts of kindness.

[2] In biblical and rabbinic literature, the kidneys (כליות) are considered the seat of conscience and moral guidance, similar to how we might refer to the heart today.

[3] This biblical reference is used sarcastically to express how the author imagines critics would respond to his presumption in writing on religious matters—with surprise and derision at someone seemingly unqualified assuming the role of a spiritual authority.

[i] An Aramaic expression meaning “like one who tries to force an elephant through the eye of a needle,” used to describe an impossible task or someone attempting something far beyond their capabilities.

[ii] A biblical reference to 1 Samuel 10:11-12, used as an idiom expressing surprise when someone engages in an activity not typically associated with them. Here it represents the imagined mockery of others who would question the author’s qualifications.

Between these matters, I lifted my eyes to heaven and my understanding returned to me.[1] And behold, a great and powerful wind broke apart the mountains of laziness and shattered the rocks of stumbling and the stones of obstruction. It awakened me like a man who is roused from his sleep, and placed upon me a voice of strength. Listen now, you who lack understanding, why does your heart lead you astray, and why does your inclination persuade you against preparing a house of refuge[2] for yourself and for others of your generation with you? Do you not know that a good measure never returns empty? Rabbi Yochanan said to Rabbi Yossi bar Chanina in Sanhedrin chapter 3: "Since you have ascended, do not descend,"[3] and "You have made a great vow to the God of Heaven." Counsel that contains the word of God will stand forever. Hurry and act as you have spoken, joining your good thoughts

[1] This opening echoes Daniel 4:31-34, where King Nebuchadnezzar describes his restoration after a period of madness. The author uses this biblical allusion to frame his spiritual awakening.

[2] The 'house of refuge' refers to Ma'avar Yabok itself, which the author is being called to complete as a spiritual guide for others facing death and illness.

[3] This Talmudic principle suggests that once someone has achieved a certain spiritual level or undertaken a sacred task, they should not abandon it for something lesser.

[i] This phrase reflects the classic Jewish spiritual tension between divine calling ("my Creator") and the limitations of human nature ("my inclination"). The author expresses being caught between his sense of divine purpose and his own self-doubt.

[ii] Cf. Talmud, Tractate Rosh Hashanah — The author cites this source to support the idea that a vineyard in the desert is especially precious, using this as a metaphor for the spiritual value of his work despite its challenging context. | Cf. Midrash Proverbs — This reference establishes the religious importance of completing good intentions rather than merely contemplating them, which reflects the author's struggle with whether to undertake his writing project. | Cf. Midrash Ruth — The author uses this reference to establish the spiritual merit of acts of kindness (gemilut chasadim), particularly as they relate to helping the sick and dying, which is the central theme of Ma'avar Yabok. | Cf. 1 Samuel 10:11-12 — This is used idiomatically to express how the author imagines others will react with surprise and mockery if he attempts to position himself as a religious authority despite his perceived unworthiness.

[iii] The text shifts here from Aramaic (with phrases like 'עיני לשמיא נטלית' and 'ומנדעי יתוב עלי') to Hebrew, creating a bilingual introduction that mirrors the style of Daniel 4:31, where the biblical text similarly shifts from Aramaic to Hebrew at a moment of spiritual awakening.

[iv] The abbreviation פ״ג stands for פרק ג, meaning 'chapter 3' of the Talmudic tractate Sanhedrin.

with action. Cast your burden upon the Lord, and He will complete the work through you, and everything for the sake of Heaven is permitted and allowed. Even a transgression for the sake of Heaven 560R is great and desirable.[1] Better to handle a carcass than to go back on your word, for every person has his merits in his basket. And as long as people's actions are focused on matters of commandment, this will not cause division below. Their path is 565R correctly directed to where the lofty and holy Divine Spirit will be, and God's angels ascend and descend through it and by its means to unify the awesome God. And we say in the Sifrei: Abaye said,
"His bundle upon the earth He founded"[2] (Amos 570R 9:6)—when Israel is united in one counsel below, His great name is praised above, as it is said, "He became King in Jeshurun when the heads of the people gathered" (Deuteronomy 33:5). And so it says, "His bundle upon the earth He founded"—not when they 575R are made into separate groups. Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai says: It is like two ships tied together[3] with ropes and nets, and they built palaces upon them and established them above. As long as the ships remain connected, the palaces stand; if the ships 580R separate, the palaces cannot stand. And they said in the Yelamdeinu, brought in Yalkut page 278: "Do not form separate factions and be divided against one another, so that you do not create a 'bald spot' (division) among yourselves,[4] as Korah did when he 585R divided Israel and made them into separate factions,

[1] This controversial statement refers to rare situations where an otherwise forbidden act might be permitted when done with pure intentions for a sacred purpose. In this context, it likely refers to the author overcoming his own sense of unworthiness to complete the book.

[2] This creative interpretation of Amos 9:6 transforms a verse about God's heavenly chambers into a teaching about communal unity. The interpretation appears in Midrash Tanchuma and other rabbinic sources.

[3] This parable attributed to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai illustrates how communal unity provides a foundation for spiritual achievements that would collapse if the community were divided.

[4] This wordplay connects Korah's name (קרח) with the term for baldness or division (קרחה), presenting him as one who created a division in the community that led to disaster.

[i] The abbreviation ש״ש stands for שם שמים (for the sake of Heaven), a fundamental concept in Jewish ethics indicating pure intention without personal gain.

[ii] This controversial concept of 'a transgression for the sake of Heaven' references the Talmudic principle derived from Judges 5:24 regarding Jael's deception of Sisera. It suggests that in extraordinary circumstances, actions normally forbidden might be permissible when done with pure intentions for a sacred purpose.

[iii] This Aramaic expression is a proverb meaning 'Turn over a carcass but do not go back on your word,' emphasizing that handling something ritually impure is preferable to breaking a commitment.

[iv] An Aramaic expression meaning 'every person has his merits in his basket,' suggesting that each individual has their own collection of good deeds and virtues.

creating a division in Israel that caused many people to be swallowed up with him." And if I become a topic of conversation among people, it is better for me to be called a fool all my days and fulfill the utterance of my lips. Though man sees the outward appearance, does not the Lord see the heart? He will search and know this good intention of mine, for nothing is hidden from Him, and He knows the secrets of the heart. And God knows that I have not come to take a crown for myself or to spread my name, God forbid. Indeed, from my lowly place, the crown of Torah rests available,[1] and whoever wishes to take the Name in the service of Heaven may take it. One who is arrogant has a blemish and is not accepted, as we say in Bava Batra, Sotah, and Megillah. All chatter related to Torah is good, and if grace has not been poured upon my lips, does not wisdom call out at the head of the noisy streets by itself? For it is a loving hind and a graceful doe. And if I am a man confused and slumbering, and I have no capacity or human understanding, is it not like a beautiful maiden without eyes[2] who adorns herself with her ornaments and sends a message to a simple man saying, "Tell that simple man to come here and converse with me," as it is written, "Whoever is simple, let him turn in here" (Proverbs 9:4). And they said in Chagigah, first chapter: Just as a plant grows and multiplies, so too the words of Torah are fruitful and multiply. "When you awake, it shall talk with you" (Proverbs 6:22). They strengthened the wine of Torah for the children so they would speak words of Torah. And if Aaron Berechia is like a donkey with a saddle[3] in comparison, I will keep moving forward, for it is his obligation to make himself like a donkey

[1] This refers to the rabbinic teaching in Pirkei Avot 4:13 that the crown of Torah is available to all who seek it, unlike other crowns (priesthood, kingship) that are restricted to certain lineages.

[2] This striking metaphor suggests that Torah wisdom possesses inherent beauty but requires human engagement and interpretation (the 'eyes') to be fully expressed and directed.

[3] The author's self-deprecation as a beast of burden for Torah recalls Moses' humility and the rabbinic value of making oneself a vessel for divine teaching rather than seeking personal glory.

[i] The text makes a wordplay on the name Korah (קרח) and the word 'baldness' or 'division' (קרחה), a pun found in rabbinic literature where Korah's rebellion is associated with causing a 'bald spot' or division in the community.

[ii] The abbreviation ח״ו stands for חס ושלום (God forbid), indicating the author's strong rejection of seeking personal fame.

[iii] References to three Talmudic tractates (Bava Batra, Sotah, and Megillah) where the principle that arrogance is a spiritual blemish is discussed.

[iv] An Aramaic phrase meaning 'a beautiful maiden without eyes,' likely alluding to Torah wisdom that is intrinsically beautiful but requires human interpretation and application to be fully expressed.

Therefore, with the help of the awesome and fearsome God, I, a despondent and weary soul, silent like Rachel[2] before the tumult of treacherous times, poor and in pain—all the days of the poor are miserable—one whose understanding is limited. [1] The passage concludes with a prayer that divine illumination will overcome the author's perceived inadequacies, reflecting the fundamental Jewish belief that Torah study itself provides enlightenment regardless of one's initial capabilities.

[2] This self-description uses biblical imagery to establish the author's emotional state. The Rachel reference creates a powerful connection to Jewish collective grief.

[i] Here the author refers to himself in the third person, calling himself 'a donkey with a saddle' as an extreme form of self-deprecation, a rhetorical device common in rabbinic literature.

[ii] The phrase 'חמרא דימא' (literally 'donkey of the sea') may refer to a sea creature (possibly a dolphin or sea lion) and is being used metaphorically to suggest that even someone with limited capacities can be 'permitted' or useful for Torah study.

[iii] Cf. Sanhedrin — The author references a Talmudic passage to support the principle that once one has begun a worthy endeavor, one should not abandon it. | Cf. Amos 9:6 — The verse about God's 'bundle upon earth' is interpreted as referring to the unity of Israel, suggesting that communal harmony is essential for divine presence. | Cf. Deuteronomy 33:5 — This verse about God becoming king when Israel's leaders gather is used to emphasize that divine glory is manifest when the community is united. | Cf. Korah narrative — Korah's rebellion is presented as a cautionary tale against causing division in the community, with severe consequences for those who create factions. | Cf. Proverbs 9:4 — This verse personifying wisdom calling to the simple is used to suggest that Torah wisdom seeks out even those who feel inadequate, offering them understanding. | Cf. Chagigah — The Talmudic passage comparing Torah to a growing plant emphasizes how Torah study produces continual growth and development in understanding. | Cf. Proverbs 6:22 — This verse suggesting that Torah speaks to one who awakes reinforces the idea that sincere Torah engagement results in ongoing inspiration and guidance. | Cf. Psalms 19:8 — This verse about Torah's perfection and its ability to make the simple wise is offered as a hopeful assurance that even those who feel inadequate can gain wisdom through Torah study.

[iv] The author compares himself to a silent Rachel, which may refer to the biblical Rachel or to the personification of the Jewish people in Jeremiah 31:15, where Rachel weeps for her children.

[v] This is a Hebrew expression of lament or woe, intensified by repetition.

[vi] "From the threshold of the Temple courtyard and outward"—a metaphorical expression indicating exclusion from sacred or privileged spaces. The term עזר״ה (with quotation marks in the original) refers specifically to the Temple courtyard.

[vii] An Aramaic expression meaning "that man depends on the Provider," with פלטר referring to God as the ultimate provider.

"He raises the poor from the dust"[1] and I roar like a lion from the straits of my frightening and terrifying times and troubles that have befallen me, as is known to all who enter the gates of my people. And "a distant physician leaves the eye blind." 640R

I am the least significant in the group, a mere mortal, like a worm, and like a finger in wax when it comes to reasoning and understanding. I am neither a carpenter nor the son of a carpenter, neither a scholar nor the son of a scholar, but rather an insignificant creature who is nullified by the majority—Aaron Berechia, son of the honorable Rabbi Moses[2] (may his Rock preserve him), son of the honorable Rabbi Nehemiah of Modena, of blessed memory, descendant of the ornament of our household's glory, my elderly, esteemed, and wise mother, Fiorita[3] (also called Bat-Sheva), widow of the brilliant Rabbi Solomon Jacob Raphael, son of the genius and extraordinary physician of his generation, Rabbi Mordecai of Modena, of blessed memory, from the early families exiled from France.[4] 645R 650R 655R

I will forever crown my head with the aforementioned elderly woman, for she, and no other with her, from the day I left my mother's womb, raised me like a son. I owe her reverence and honor as to a father and mother, and also as a teacher who instructed me in the way of wisdom, although I am neither wise nor a seer, and I have not fully learned or mastered, but 660R 665R

[1] A quotation from Psalm 113:7, expressing hope that God will elevate the author from his lowly state.
[2] This genealogical passage establishes the author's identity and lineage, which was important in rabbinic tradition to establish authority.
[3] The author gives special prominence to his grandmother who raised him, showing the importance of maternal lineage in his self-identity.
[4] This reference to the French expulsion establishes the author's family as having Sephardic origins, despite living in Italy.

[i] An Aramaic proverb meaning "a distant physician leaves the eye blind," suggesting that distant help is ineffective.
[ii] An Aramaic expression comparing his intellectual capacity to "a finger in wax," suggesting malleability or limited impact.
[iii] An Aramaic expression of humility: "I am neither a carpenter nor the son of a carpenter, neither a scholar nor the son of a scholar."
[iv] An Aramaic expression meaning "an insignificant creature who is nullified by the majority," a self-deprecating rabbinic formula.
[v] An abbreviation for "son of the honorable Rabbi."
[vi] An abbreviation for "may his Rock preserve him," a blessing for the living.
[vii] His grandmother had both an Italian name (Fiorita) and a Hebrew name (Bat-Sheva).
[viii] An abbreviation for "the honorable Rabbi, our teacher."
[x] Referring to families expelled from France in the medieval Jewish expulsions, establishing the author's Sephardic lineage.

rather grope along the path of my mother.

And now, with great reverence, I humble myself in the dust at my teachers' feet, accepting their authority over me. With their permission, I offer the dry bone that has fallen to my lot, though it is but dough in the cracks of the kneading trough. My words may please the young who sit in song. I have placed it on my small tables, which are tiny and bare-boned. As they say, "Bring them a small amount of grain for a zuz." And perhaps even those who eat fatty meat at golden tables will see and rejoice—not that they need me or words like these, for to city-dwellers these are trifling matters, as their discussions shatter roofs. 670R 675R

Rather, I do this for the general benefit, for why should we, the people of Abraham's God, be diminished[1] from searching through the sacks of our Torah and devising from it a proper invention for ourselves, to offer our souls as a pleasing fragrance[2] before our King, the Lord of Hosts is His name, in holy splendor? Would it not be valuable, worth fine gold of Ophir, if everyone had ready at hand, inscribed with an iron pen and lead, special sermons, psalms, requests, and arranged and organized verses? All the more so for the simple folk like myself or those lesser than me, who comprise the vast majority, so that they may meditate or instruct others to meditate on 680R 685R 690R

[1] This phrase echoes Numbers 9:7, where people who couldn't offer the Passover sacrifice asked why they should be diminished or excluded.

[2] This phrase uses Temple sacrifice terminology to describe spiritual devotion, suggesting the book serves as a substitute for Temple worship.

[i] An Aramaic expression of humility: "although I am neither wise nor a seer, and I have not fully learned or mastered, but rather grope along the path of my mother."

[ii] A traditional expression of humility, referring to sitting at the feet of teachers and being covered in the dust they kick up—indicating complete devotion to learning from them.

[iii] An Aramaic expression meaning "the dry bone that has fallen to my lot," a metaphor for the limited knowledge or resource the author possesses.

[iv] A metaphor comparing his contribution to dough stuck in the cracks of a kneading trough—seemingly insignificant but still of some value.

[v] Literally "those who sit in song," referring to young students who recite Torah passages melodically as they learn.

[vi] An Aramaic expression describing tables that are small and bare-boned, continuing the metaphor of limited resources.

[vii] An Aramaic expression meaning "Bring them a small amount of grain for a zuz," suggesting providing modest but valuable sustenance.

[viii] An Aramaic expression meaning "their discussions shatter roofs," referring to sophisticated scholarly discourse that is beyond the author's level.

[ix] A biblical allusion to Job 28:16, referring to something of great value, comparable to the fine gold of Ophir.

[x] A biblical allusion to Job 19:24, referring to writing something permanently, as if engraved with an iron pen and lead.

Therefore I said, "It is time to act for the Lord," and "When others gather, scatter,"[A] and "If a common person's writings are like finding lost property, they are not considered proper compositions,"[B] and "A deaf-mute, mentally incompetent person, or minor have no intellectual capacity," and "One does not learn from a small person."[C] Yet before our eyes is the statement in Numbers Rabbah, chapter 14, on the verse "The words of the wise are like goads": How do we know that if a person hears something from the mouth of the least significant person in Israel, it should be in his eyes as if hearing from a sage of Israel? The verse teaches, "And it shall come

[A] Or: "and "At a time when others gather in, scatter,"" — This is a reference to a rabbinic saying about when to gather or scatter resources. The alternate translation makes the contrast between 'gathering in' and 'scattering' more explicit.

[B] Or: "and "If the compositions of an ordinary person are like found objects, they are not considered real compositions,"" — This difficult phrase is the author's self-deprecation. The alternate translation more directly conveys the metaphor comparing amateur writings to found objects rather than deliberate compositions.

[C] Or: ""One does not learn from a person of little significance."" — The Aramaic phrase 'bar nash ze'ir' refers not necessarily to physical smallness but to someone of lesser stature or importance in a social or intellectual hierarchy.

[1] This final phrase introduces a central theme of Ma'avar Yabok: providing spiritual guidance for those suffering from illness, particularly near death.

[i] An Aramaic legal term meaning "the vast majority."

[ii] A phrase referring to difficult times or times of hardship.

[iii] A phrase suggesting entering and leaving a situation in an imperfect state, without transformation.

[iv] A biblical allusion to Job 33:19, referring to being rebuked with pain upon one's sickbed, introducing the book's theme of illness as divine correction.

[v] Cf. Book of Job — The author draws on Job's suffering to establish the book's theological framework that illness and suffering can be forms of divine communication and correction, central to Ma'avar Yabok's purpose. | Cf. Psalms — This quotation establishes the author's hope for divine elevation despite his lowly state, setting up the book's theme of divine mercy toward those in distress. | Cf. Numbers — The author echoes the question asked by those who couldn't offer the Passover sacrifice, suggesting that his work provides a means for ordinary people to participate in spiritual service despite their limitations.

to pass, if you shall hearken diligently to my commandments." And not just as hearing from a sage, but as hearing from sages, as it says, etc. And not just as hearing from sages, but as hearing from the Great Sanhedrin, etc. And not just as hearing from the Great Sanhedrin, but as hearing from Moses. And not just as hearing from Moses, but as hearing from the mouth of God, as it says, "Given from one shepherd." And Solomon taught people knowledge from the lowly ant, and from everything a person can learn, even though one who comes to teach may end up learning himself.[1] 710R 715R 720R

And they said in Song of Songs Rabbah: Just as a great person is not embarrassed to say to a lesser one,[2] "Please give me a little water to drink," so too with words of Torah—a great person should not be embarrassed to say to a lesser one, "Teach me one thing about Torah." And it says in Tractate Berakhot: "A single egg is better than six measures of fine flour."[A] They also said in Ecclesiastes Midrash, page 69b: "The generation that comes should be in your eyes like the generation that goes. Do not say, 'If Rabbi Akiva were alive, I would read before him; if Rabbi Zeira and Rabbi Yochanan were alive, I would study before them.'" And they said in Chapter 4 of Bava Metzia: "Whoever makes himself small for the sake of words of Torah in this world becomes great in the World to Come, and whoever makes himself like 725R 730R 735R

[A] Or: ""One egg is better than six kav of fine flour."" — This Talmudic proverb uses the specific measurement 'kav' rather than a generic 'measure.' The saying means that sometimes a small amount of substantial food is better than a larger amount of less nourishing food, metaphorically suggesting that a small, valuable teaching is better than many less valuable ones.

[1] This is a reference to a Talmudic saying found in Taanit 7a that "I have learned much from my teachers, more from my colleagues, and the most from my students"—suggesting that teaching others is itself a learning experience.

[2] The author is drawing a parallel between asking for water (a basic physical need where status differences become irrelevant) and asking for Torah knowledge (a spiritual need where one should similarly disregard status hierarchies).

[i] This Aramaic saying from Berakhot 44b means "One egg is better than six kav of fine flour"—a proverb suggesting that sometimes a small amount of substantial food is better than a larger amount of less nourishing food. The author uses this metaphorically to suggest that his small contribution might be more valuable than it appears.

[ii] This quote from Job 3:19 ("Small and great are there") is interpreted in the rabbinic context to mean that in the World to Come, the spiritual hierarchy may be reversed—those who humble themselves for Torah study in this world will be elevated in the next.

[iii] Cf. Song of Songs Rabbah — The author uses this reference to support his argument for humility in Torah learning—that even great scholars should be willing to learn from those of lesser stature. This reinforces the book's theme that wisdom can come from unexpected sources and that pride should not prevent one from gaining knowledge that might be spiritually beneficial, especially regarding preparation for death. | Cf. Numbers Rabbah — The author uses this reference

a servant for words of Torah in this world becomes free in the World to Come, as it is written, 'Small and great are there.'" 740R

Through this, the listeners will merit two tables,[1] for the one who meditates before them will increase knowledge, as it is written in Midrash Proverbs, page 69b: "From teaching others, you yourself learn," as it says: "A generous soul will prosper, and 745R one who waters will himself be watered." And the merit of the many, which is superior, has benefited me through their approach, and the Torah of truth has supported me, until with the help of the One who illuminates the earth and its inhabitants, I 750R have planted magnificence,[2] as it is said: "The Lord is majestic on high," or "assembly" as they said in Yom Tov, chapter 2: "People say, what is an assembly? That which endures for generations."

I have composed various innovations and 755R discourses which together all express words of abstinence, purity, and holiness, thirty in number, and I have supported them with the right hand of humility and modesty. I have named them "Ma'avar Yabok"[3] (Crossing of the Jabbok), to offer and burn 760R them with love and reverence before the entire holy congregation. Like maidens playing timbrels,[4] they will cross over a rickety bridge from the world

[1]The metaphor of 'two tables' (שתי שולחנות) is a rabbinic concept referring to benefits in both this world and the World to Come, suggesting the spiritual teachings provide immediate and eternal rewards.

[2]The Hebrew 'אדר נטעתי' contains a wordplay connecting to both 'magnificence' and possibly the month of Adar, while also referencing the concept of an 'assembly' (אדרא) that endures for generations.

[3]The book's title refers to the biblical Jabbok River crossing where Jacob wrestled with an angel (Genesis 32), serving as a metaphor for the soul's transition from life to death.

[4]This image alludes to Exodus 15:20 where women celebrated the crossing of the Red Sea with timbrels, creating a parallel between that redemptive crossing and the soul's journey after death.

to establish the principle that all Torah wisdom ultimately comes from God, regardless of who transmits it. This supports his implicit argument that readers should value his work Ma'avar Yabok despite his self-proclaimed unworthiness, as the teachings it contains have divine origin. This reference elevates the spiritual authority of the text while maintaining the author's humble posture.

[i]The concept of 'two tables' here likely refers to benefiting both in this world and the World to Come, or possibly to both physical and spiritual sustenance.

[ii]This is a quote from Proverbs 11:25, which teaches that those who are generous will themselves be enriched—here applied to teaching and sharing spiritual wisdom.

[iii]The term 'adra' (assembly) has kabbalistic significance, referring to special mystical gatherings or compilations. The phrase 'that which endures for generations' emphasizes the lasting spiritual impact the author hopes his work will have.

of exchange and destruction, which has distorted the heavenly state, to connect with the delights of unification, blessing, and holiness. Through this, the offering—a first-fruits offering—will pass before us, and we will cross the ford of Jabbok to wrestle with the Lord, the Man of War, until the dawn rises, which is the resurrection. For then our souls and bodies will no longer be called Jacob, but Israel, as we will become a kingdom of priests and merit seeing God face to face, for the sun of righteousness will shine upon us with healing. 765R 770R

The essence of these discourses—many of them are appropriate and suitable to discuss and meditate upon before a sick person at the beginning of his illness, to open his watchful eye with excellent words[1] before his condition becomes too burdensome and his thoughts trouble him. How will he be appeased if not by seeking relief for his healing? And some of them are established and designated for one whose days are drawing near to death, when his pure soul cries out saying: "Take me out from here, from this blocked body,[2] that I may cross over and see the good land that is beyond the river on the right, and behold the light of the Ancient King, and this good mountain, which is the evil inclination that has been whitened like snow."[3] For there the Lord has commanded unity, blessing, and holiness. 775R 780R 785R 790R

[1] The original uses Aramaic expressions (לפצוחי עינא פקיחא דיליה במילי מעלייתא) that I've rendered in comprehensible English while preserving the meaning of awakening spiritual awareness through valuable teachings.

[2] This passage uses Aramaic expressions to dramatize the soul's desire to leave the physical body, which it experiences as a confinement. The original includes emphatic repetition (כ״ר כ״ר) expressing urgency.

[3] This kabbalistic image (יצרא דעבירה דאתלבן בתלגא חיוורא) describes the transformation of the evil inclination into something pure in the afterlife—a profound mystical concept about ultimate spiritual redemption.

[i] This alludes to Jacob wrestling with the divine being at the Jabbok ford (Genesis 32:22-32), which the author uses as a metaphor for the soul's struggle during the transition from life to death.

[ii] This references Jacob's name change to Israel after his struggle at the Jabbok (Genesis 32:28), suggesting that after death and resurrection, the soul and body will achieve a higher spiritual status, just as Jacob became Israel.

[iii] This Aramaic expression depicts the soul crying out to be released from the physical body, which it experiences as a confinement. The repeated 'כ״ר כ״ר' likely represents an intensified form of 'now' or 'immediately', emphasizing the soul's urgent desire for liberation.

[iv] This striking kabbalistic image describes the evil inclination (yetzer ha-ra) being transformed and purified 'white as snow', suggesting that in the afterlife, even our negative inclinations are redeemed and transformed.

of the soul, he will not be terrified by the sound of death, nor will he be affected by the noise of its crushing, for there the weary find rest. For the righteous, the day of emergence from the womb is the birth of the body, and the day of his death is the birth of the soul.[1]

Go now, my brother, for your sake, set your eyes upon the words of the sage, the author of the Akedah, Gate 22, page 66b, on the verse "She laughs at the final day," in the beautiful parable he gave about the house of rest in the world of souls, and the answer to the question asked of him about the goodness of the soul after its departure. Truly, his words are sweet, and why should we copy something without innovation? Go and see there for yourself.

We are assured by the mercies of Heaven that when these discourses settle upon a person's heart as he hears them, every person of clean hands will gain strength, his heart will be inflamed, and the foreskin of his heart will be removed, so that his face will be set and he will gird his loins like a man to strengthen and fortify himself in the service of Heaven.

[1] This theological formulation frames death as the soul's birth into spiritual existence, inverting the conventional understanding of birth and death to present a positive view of mortality as spiritual transition.

[i] This is a profound theological statement framing death not as an end but as the soul's birth into a higher spiritual existence—inverting the usual understanding of birth and death.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase meaning 'go out and see there' directs the reader to consult the original source (Sefer HaAkedah) rather than relying on a secondary citation, reflecting the author's scholarly approach.

[iii] Cf. Midrash Proverbs — The author uses this rabbinic quote to establish that through teaching others spiritual matters, the teacher also gains knowledge. This supports his purpose in creating the book as both helping others and developing his own understanding. | Cf. Proverbs 11:25 — This biblical verse reinforces the idea that those who give spiritual guidance to others will themselves be spiritually enriched, establishing the reciprocal nature of teaching and learning. | Cf. Genesis 32:22-32 — The title 'Ma'avar Yabok' (Crossing of the Jabbok) directly references Jacob's transformative night struggle before meeting Esau. This becomes a central metaphor for the soul's transition from life to death, suggesting that death, like Jacob's crossing, is a transformative spiritual passage. | Cf. Malachi 3:20 (4:2 in some translations) — This prophetic verse is used to describe the ultimate spiritual reward at resurrection, comparing it to the rising sun. The author uses this to provide hope and comfort regarding death, framing it as a transition to a greater spiritual light. | Cf. Psalm 37:37 — The reference to 'the house of rest in the world of souls' reflects the Psalm's teaching about the peaceful end of the righteous, reinforcing that death leads to spiritual rest for the virtuous. | Cf. Sefer HaAkedah (The Binding of Isaac) by Rabbi Isaac Arama — The author directs readers to this philosophical work for deeper understanding of the soul's journey after death, showing how his work builds upon established Jewish philosophical tradition. | Cf. Zohar — The mystical language about the 'Ancient King' (מלכא סבא) and the whitening of the evil inclination reflect Zoharic concepts about the soul's purification and divine encounters after death, establishing the kabbalistic framework of the author's approach.

In the many discourses I will present, I have contemplated the Scriptures, sayings of our Sages in the Talmud, various midrashim, aggadot, and the words of the Zohar—its commandments, Ra'aya Mehemna, Tikkunim, and similar works. Through these, the Lord has illuminated my eyes.[1] I have developed new insights and found nourishing food along with streams of honey and butter,[2] offering sheaves of praise and abundant thanksgiving to the One who has rewarded and privileged me. For each of these teachings, I have provided their reasoning so they will not be forgotten nor depart from my mouth forever, as stated in the Jerusalem Talmud in Pesachim: "Rabbi Ze'ira said in the name of Rabbi Eleazar, 'Any Torah teaching without a source foundation is not Torah,'" meaning that without a parallel example from elsewhere, even if it was given to Moses at Sinai, it is likely to be forgotten. 820R 825R 830R

Therefore, if perhaps some error is found, let no empty accusations be made against others, but rather against me, for I have erred because I did not know. However, some of these teachings are received traditions passed from person to person, reliable to those who hear them, while others are written in books. I am but a minor student of their disciples, and from their waters I drink. Still, the scholars of our people have explained these matters to the wise who understand through their broad knowledge, teaching them principles in outline form, for to the wise a hint suffices. Many of these teachings require no proof, like laws given to Moses at Sinai,[3] and I have come after them to explain them somewhat and to provide additional support from the words of our Sages, so that hearing from a teacher will not be 835R 840R 845R

[1] The Hebrew phrase 'עיני׳ 'האיר ה is a common biblical and rabbinic expression indicating divine inspiration or enlightenment in understanding sacred texts.

[2] The author uses metaphorical language of food and sweetness to describe the spiritual and intellectual nourishment he found in his studies, drawing on biblical imagery of the promised land flowing with milk and honey.

[3] The phrase 'הלכה למשה מסיני' (law given to Moses at Sinai) refers to traditions considered so authoritative they're attributed to divine revelation at Sinai, even when they lack explicit textual sources in the Torah.

[i] The author lists his textual sources, including Talmud, midrashim, aggadot, and multiple sections of the Zohar. 'ר״מ' is an abbreviation for 'Ra'aya Mehemna' (Faithful Shepherd), a section of the Zohar, while 'תקונים' refers to 'Tikkunei Zohar', another kabbalistic text in the Zoharic corpus.

[ii] The phrase 'בוקי סריקי' (bukei sriki) is an Aramaic expression meaning 'empty pitchers' or figuratively 'empty accusations.' The author is using a rhetorical formula of humility, taking personal responsibility for any errors while implicitly demonstrating his erudition.

[iii] An Aramaic expression meaning 'to the wise, a hint is sufficient'—suggesting that knowledgeable readers will understand deeper meanings with minimal explanation.

it arose in my mind[A] to produce this book, my

I have named the first section of this work[C] "The Discourse of Righteous Lips,"[D] for in it the deeds of all Israel shall be justified and praised in the 865R gates.[2] It contains forty chapters, and within it are verses, remedies, and stories designed according to [A] Or: "My contemplations have awakened me, and so it occurred to me" — This alternate translation captures the poetic quality of the Hebrew while maintaining the sense of internal inspiration. It's slightly less literal but more natural in English.

[B] Or: "and to structure and fortify it upon four pillars" — This alternative uses 'pillars' instead of 'foundations' to better convey the architectural metaphor in the Hebrew, with 'structure and fortify' capturing the intent of 'establish and support.'

[C] Or: "From its first entrance" — The phrase 'בבא קמא' could be interpreted literally as 'first gate' or 'first entrance,' which would change the meaning to indicate the book begins with this section rather than the author naming it. However, the context strongly suggests the author is naming the first section, making the original translation more appropriate.

[D] Or: "I have called its name 'The Discourse of Righteous Lips,'" — This translation is more literal and preserves the Hebrew sentence structure, though the original translation captures the meaning effectively while being more natural in English.

[1] The phrase 'מגן אמירי ספרי זה' contains a play on words that's difficult to fully capture in translation. 'מגן' can mean shield/protection, while 'אמירי' suggests both 'my sayings/words' and something precious or exalted.

[2] This phrase alludes to Proverbs 31:31, where the virtuous woman's works 'praise her in the gates,' suggesting that proper end-of-life practices bring honor to the Jewish community.

[i] The author is describing the structure of his book Ma'avar Yabok, stating that it will be organized around four foundations or aspects, corresponding to the four letters of 'Yabok' (יבק), as he will elaborate in the following text.

[ii] Cf. Jerusalem Talmud, Pesachim — The author uses this citation to justify his methodological approach of providing supporting evidence from rabbinic literature for his interpretations and insights | Cf. Zohar — By emphasizing his reliance on kabbalistic literature, particularly the Zohar, the author establishes the mystical orientation of his work Ma'avar Yabok | Cf. Mount Sinai revelation — This reference connects the author's work to the divine revelation at Sinai, suggesting that his teachings tap into the eternal wisdom granted to all Jewish souls at that foundational moment

[iii] This is the title of the first major section of Ma'avar Yabok. The name 'Siftei Tzedek' (Righteous Lips) has theological significance, suggesting speech that is both morally righteous and spiritually effective.

[iv] The number forty has symbolic significance in Jewish tradition, often representing a complete spiritual process or transformation (e.g., forty days of the flood, forty years in the wilderness, forty days of Moses on Mount Sinai).

The second discourse derived from it[B] I've titled "Ma'amar Sfat Emet" (Discourse of Truthful Speech). It consists of thirty-seven chapters[2] that explain the proper rituals and rectifications to be performed for the deceased, which is the true kindness [performed for those who cannot repay], along with many other precious expositions more valuable than gold and fine gold. 875R 880R

[A] Or: "or if he entrusts his soul to God's hand, he will divide spoils with the mighty" — This alternative is more literal and directly references Isaiah 53:12, which uses similar phrasing about dividing spoils with the mighty. It preserves the biblical allusion more explicitly, though the original translation effectively conveys the meaning.

[B] Or: "The middle section of it" — A more literal translation of 'bava metzia' would be 'middle gate' or 'middle section,' which refers to the second of three sections in Talmudic organization. The author is using this terminology metaphorically to indicate the second major division of his work.

[1] The author acknowledges that the work expanded significantly beyond its initial conception, with additional teachings incorporated throughout the composition process.

[2] The number thirty-seven may have mystical significance, as numbers often do in kabbalistic works. In gematria (Jewish numerology), 37 is the value of 'yechidah' (the highest level of the soul).

[i] This is an allusion to Isaiah 53:12, which in its original context refers to the reward of the righteous servant who bears the sins of many. Here it is applied to the dying person who has properly prepared spiritually.

[ii] This parenthetical comment, indicating that the additions exceed the original foundation, reveals the organic development of Ma'avar Yabok, which apparently grew significantly beyond its initial conception as the author incorporated more material.

[iii] Cf. Isaiah 53:12 — The author is drawing a parallel between the dying person who entrusts their soul to God and the biblical righteous servant who receives divine rewards after suffering. This suggests that proper spiritual preparation for death leads to spiritual rewards. | Cf. Proverbs 31:31 — The author adapts this praise of the virtuous woman to refer to how proper spiritual practices during illness and death will bring honor to all Israel. This suggests that proper end-of-life rituals reflect positively on the entire community. | Cf. Bible—References to covenants — The author frames proper end-of-life practices as a form of covenant observance, suggesting that the guidelines in this section have binding religious significance similar to biblical covenants.

[iv] Cf. Rashi on Genesis 47:29 — The phrase 'chesed shel emet' (true kindness) is commonly understood, following Rashi's comment on Genesis 47:29, as referring specifically to kindness shown to the dead, who cannot repay the favor. This is why burial and funeral practices are considered the ultimate form of selfless kindness.

The final section from it[A] is true to its name,[1] and it is fitting for it to be called "Discourse of Lips of to speak words toward the Most High concerning all deeds. At the end of the discourse are chapters about Gehinnom and chapters about the Garden of Eden,[B] and the intention of unification.[3] Its 890R

The final and most honored discourse bears a name that suits it well, and it is itself well-suited to its name: "Eter Anan HaKetoret" (Cloud of Incense Prayer[D]). It contains three different types of ex- 895R positions. The first part elevates the order of the incense preparation, along with other related expositions, and consists of eight chapters. The second

[A] Or: "The concluding part of the book" — The phrase 'Bava Batra' could be interpreted as 'last gate' or 'final section,' but in context it clearly refers to the concluding part of the book Ma'avar Yabok rather than the Talmudic tractate of the same name.

[B] Or: "sections concerning Hell and Paradise" — While the literal translation is accurate, 'Hell and Paradise' might be more immediately recognizable to modern readers, though 'Gehinnom and Garden of Eden' preserves the specific Jewish theological concepts.

[C] Or: "Its chapters, sections, and halls are forty-six in number" — The architectural metaphor used here (chambers and halls) refers to the structure of the text. This alternate translation maintains the architectural imagery while clarifying the meaning.

[D] Or: "The Fragrant Cloud of Incense" — This alternate translation more directly captures the sensory quality implied in the Hebrew term 'eter' which suggests a rising fragrance or pleasant smell. However, the original translation better preserves the liturgical context.

[1] The text makes a wordplay suggesting that the name of this discourse (Siftei Renanot/Lips of Praise) perfectly captures its essence and purpose.

[2] The phrase 'chesed shel emet' (true kindness) specifically refers to care for the dead in Jewish tradition, as it is considered the purest form of kindness since the deceased cannot reciprocate.

[3] In Kabbalistic terminology, 'kavvanat ha-yichud' refers to specific mystical meditations and intentions focused on unifying the divine name and various spiritual worlds, particularly important during prayer and at the time of death.

[i] These three elements—chapters on Gehinnom (Hell), chapters on Gan Eden (Paradise), and teachings on divine unification—represent the mystical culmination of the text, addressing both the afterlife journey of the soul and the ultimate spiritual goal of unifying with the divine.

[ii] The author uses architectural terminology from the Temple (chambers and halls) as a metaphor for the text's structure, implying that studying this discourse is analogous to moving through sacred space.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok structure — This text summarizes the final section of Ma'avar Yabok, explaining its name, purpose, and structure, which complements the earlier outline of the book's organization presented in the introduction. | Cf. Maaseh Merkavah — The architectural language used here (chambers, halls) echoes the tradition of Merkavah mysticism where heavenly palaces and chambers represent spiritual levels and realms of understanding.

[iv] This poetic title for the fourth discourse combines three elements: 'eter' (prayer/supplication), 'anan' (cloud), and 'ketoret' (incense), evoking the ritual incense offering in the ancient Temple as described in Exodus 30:34-38. This reflects the post-Temple Jewish approach of replacing physical sacrifices with prayer and text study.

part is called “Korban Ta’anit” (Sacrifice of Fasting[1]), and it is a good and beautiful spiritual rectification that one can easily practice at least one day each month; it has seven chapters. The third part of the fourth discourse I have named “Minchat Aharon” (Aaron’s Offering[2]), which consists of arrangements of verses from the Bible with a few supplications bound together with bonds of love. With these, anyone desiring to sanctify themselves may sing and chant[A] after the morning and afternoon prayers, or before them, for this is what the Lord desires and has chosen for His people Israel in the unifications of love.[B] It contains eighteen chapters. 900R 905R 910R

The essence taught[C] by these four discourses is [A] Or: “And through these, all who wish to sanctify themselves shall sing praises and melodies” — This alternate translation emphasizes the musical quality of the devotional practice and captures the spiritual intention more poetically, though the original translation is more concise and accurate.

[B] Or: “through the mystical unifications of AHVH (love)” — This alternate translation makes explicit the kabbalistic connotation that is implicit in the original text, where AHVH likely represents a divine name or mystical acronym related to love and unification in Kabbalistic practice.

[C] Or: “The guiding essence” — The word ‘המורה’ can mean ‘that which teaches/guides,’ making this a slightly more literal rendering, though the current translation effectively captures the meaning in context.

[1] This section presents fasting as a spiritual substitute for Temple sacrifices, reflecting the broader Jewish mystical tradition of transforming bodily practices into spiritual offerings. The author recommends this practice be performed at least monthly, making it accessible even to those who cannot maintain more frequent ascetic practices.

[2] This title creates a deliberate connection between the author (Aaron Berechia) and the biblical High Priest Aaron. Just as Aaron offered incense in the Temple, the author presents these prayer arrangements as a form of spiritual offering that can be made by ordinary individuals in post-Temple Judaism.

[i] Literally ‘Sacrifice of Fasting,’ this term reflects the rabbinic concept that after the Temple’s destruction, fasting could serve as a substitute for sacrificial offerings. The Hebrew word ‘korban’ specifically refers to sacrifices brought to the Temple.

[ii] Literally ‘Aaron’s Offering,’ this title creates a wordplay between the author’s name (Aaron Berechia) and the biblical Aaron (first High Priest). A ‘minchah’ was specifically a grain offering in the Temple, but here refers to a collection of scriptural verses and prayers.

[iii] This phrase reflects kabbalistic terminology where ‘yichudim’ (unifications) refers to mystical practices intended to unify divine attributes. The acronym אהב״ה (AHVH) may represent a divine name or concept related to love, suggesting these prayers create loving unifications in divine realms.

[iv] Cf. Ketoret (Temple incense offering) — The author elevates the recitation of the incense formula to a central spiritual practice that serves as a substitute for the actual Temple offering. This reflects the post-Temple Jewish approach of replacing physical sacrifices with prayer. | Cf. Fasting as sacrifice — The author frames regular fasting as ‘Korban Ta’anit’ (Sacrifice of Fasting), suggesting that monthly fasting serves as a spiritual equivalent to Temple sacrifices, reflecting the broader Jewish mystical tradition of transforming bodily practices into spiritual offerings. | Cf. Aaron as High Priest — By naming the third section ‘Minchat Aharon’ (Aaron’s Offering), the author creates a wordplay connecting himself (Aaron Berechia) with the biblical Aaron, suggesting that these prayers serve as a substitute for the High Priest’s offerings in the Temple. | Cf. Divine unifications (yichudim) — The reference to ‘unifications of love’ (yichudei ahavah) indicates that these prayers are designed not merely as petitions but as mystical practices intended to create cosmic unifications in the divine realms, following Kabbalistic models of prayer as spiritual repair.

as follows: In the first discourse, one learns how to seek one's Creator[1] through confession, prayer, and repentance, corresponding to the letter Yod of Yabok, which represents unification[2] (Yichud). The second discourse brings blessing to the soul and body of a person through the rectifications explained therein, corresponding to the Bet of Yabok, which signifies blessing (Berachah). In the third discourse, one sanctifies oneself by reading or having others read its expositions to one's ears, alluded to by the Kuf of Yabok, which indicates holiness (Kedushah). And through the power of unification, blessing, and holiness, the righteous will inherit the land of desire and their souls will lodge in goodness. Thus will the cloud of incense prayer ascend[3] through the sacrifice of fasting and through the offering of Aaron, the man of kindness and attendant of the Divine Presence,[A4] from the lowest to the highest realms.[B] Then the earth will answer the heavens,[5] and the heavens will answer the earth, bringing abundant goodness to the House of Israel. [A]Or: "groomsman of the Divine Queen" — The term 'shoshvin' specifically refers to a groomsman or best man in wedding contexts, and 'matronita' is often specifically translated as the Divine Queen, emphasizing the feminine aspect of divinity in Kabbalah. This alternative more directly preserves the marriage metaphor used in kabbalistic literature.

[B]Or: "from below to above" — A more literal translation that maintains the directional simplicity of the Hebrew while still conveying the ascent from earthly to heavenly realms.

[1]The Hebrew verb 'לשחר' (to seek) has connotations of seeking early in the morning, suggesting an eager, diligent seeking of God.

[2]The original text uses abbreviations marked with quotation marks (י״חו״ד) to indicate that the letter Yod stands for 'Yichud' (unification), a key kabbalistic concept relating to the unification of divine aspects.

[3]The Hebrew term 'עתר ענן הקטרה' combines 'prayer' (עתר), 'cloud' (ענן), and 'incense' (קטרה), evoking the incense offering in the ancient Temple, which is used throughout Ma'avar Yabok as a metaphor for prayer.

[4]The phrase 'שושבינא דמטרוניתא' (attendant of the Divine Presence) is in Aramaic and refers to someone who serves the Shekhinah (Divine Presence). The author creates a wordplay between his own name (Aaron Berechia) and the biblical High Priest Aaron.

[5]This phrase alludes to Hosea 2:23-24, reversing the natural order (usually heaven answers earth) to emphasize how proper spiritual practice creates a reciprocal relationship between upper and lower worlds in kabbalistic thought.

[i]This is a summary statement outlining the essence of all four discourses that make up the book Ma'avar Yabok.

[ii]The author uses a creative device where each letter of the word 'Yabok' (יבק) corresponds to a spiritual quality: Yod (י) represents Yichud (unification), Bet (ב) represents Berachah (blessing), and Kuf (ק) represents Kedushah (holiness).

[iii]This phrase alludes to Psalms 25:13, which speaks of the rewards for those who fear God.

[iv]This Aramaic phrase means 'attendant of the Queen/Divine Presence' and is a kabbalistic term referring to those who serve the Shekhinah (Divine Presence). Here it is applied to Aaron, creating a connection between the biblical Aaron and the author Aaron Berechia.

[v]This is an allusion to Hosea 2:23-24, which describes cosmic harmony and agricultural abundance

There are three that improve one's steps: the types of verses, unifications, psalms, and supplications that are explained in these discourses. The first collection was chosen to protect those who take to their beds with any ailment, that they may offer prayer to God through them, so that healing will come to them, and on the third day salvation will spring forth for them. Then they will ascend to the house of the Lord to give thanks for His kindness, and all their sins will be forgiven, as stated in the fourth chapter of Tractate Nedarim. The reasons are sufficient to satisfy the souls of those who study why I chose verses.[A] The final chapters of the fourth discourse—the section I named "Minchat Aharon" (Aaron's Offering)—will speak clearly.[2] Anyone who desires may fill their hand from there[3] and the righteous will maintain their way, and through the utterances of their mouth they will sustain their soul and magnify God's kindness all day, and through God they will gain strength. The general principle arising from there is that one who engages with scriptural verses in prayers and supplications—there is no greater virtue than this. This is the path 940R 945R 950R 955R

[A] Or: "The reasons provided are sufficient to satisfy the minds of those who study why I chose scriptural verses" — The Hebrew 'nefesh' (soul) is sometimes used idiomatically to refer to the mind or intellect. This alternate translation might better convey the intellectual satisfaction the author promises rather than spiritual satisfaction.

[1] The Hebrew terms 'תאיו ואולמיו ופרקיו' (chambers, halls, and chapters) use architectural metaphors to describe the textual structure of the book, a common device in rabbinic literature.

[2] The author is indicating that his reasoning for preferring scriptural verses in prayer will be fully explained in the later part of his work titled 'Minchat Aharon.'

[3] This is a biblical expression meaning to take or receive something, often used in the context of priestly consecration. Here it means readers can take whatever spiritual wisdom they need from that section.

as signs of covenant restoration. In this context, it suggests that proper spiritual practice creates channels of blessing between heavenly and earthly realms.

[i] The author notes that the four discourses contain a total of 157 sections, chambers, or chapters, providing a comprehensive numerical accounting of the work's structure.

[ii] Cf. Song of Songs 3:11 — The author draws on the Song of Songs tradition of describing spiritual relationships in terms of wedding imagery, casting Aaron (likely referring to himself as the author) as an attendant at the mystical wedding between God and Israel (the Divine Presence or Shekhinah). | Cf. Hosea 2:23-24 — The author employs this prophetic image of cosmic harmony to suggest that proper spiritual practice creates a channel of divine influence flowing between heavenly and earthly realms, resulting in divine blessing. | Cf. Psalms 25:13 — The author draws on biblical promises of reward for the righteous to indicate that following the spiritual system laid out in Ma'avar Yabok leads to both worldly blessing and spiritual fulfillment.

I followed in my "Illuminators of Dawn" prayer society,[1] for I did not multiply words with a weak voice before the Lord God who knows each person and their conversation, and how inferior is this vessel who has done as I have today rather than recounting His abundant praise, the majority of which comes from the words of prophecy and songs of praise plucked from the fragrant plants upon the bushes. Even though they said in the Gemara chapter "These Findings" and in the Jerusalem Talmud, Tractate Shabbat, chapter "All Sacred Writings," Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai taught: "One who engages with Scripture—it is a virtue but not a virtue." Rashi has already explained why the Mishnah and Gemara are superior to Scripture: because they depend on oral recitation and are forgotten, since in their days the Gemara was not written down and was not permitted to be written, except that as hearts diminished and generations began to write them down because "it is time to act for the Lord," etc. Thus far. And the author of Yefeh Mareh[2] confirmed his words. Indeed, were it not for preserving the oral tradition, certainly Scripture, which was spoken through prophecy and divine inspiration, takes precedence over the words of the Mishnah and Gemara, and certainly over words of Aggadah that came in the parables of liturgical poets, especially those that the public did not accept upon themselves. And if they were sifted and eliminated by pleasant voices, turning to Scripture would be better than them. And regarding the order of prayer, everyone agrees that Scripture is essential, for the time for Torah study is separate and the time for prayer is separate.[A] And they said in Tractate Eruvin, chapter 3, that Rabbi Yochanan ben Nuri stood on his feet against Rabbi Joshua and said, "I see that the body follows the head," and they explained his words to mean, "I see according to the law and custom that we must follow the words of the early authorities, for the fingernail of [A] Or: "And regarding prayer liturgy, all authorities agree that Scripture is foundational, since the time for Torah study is distinct from the time for prayer" — This alternate translation more clearly conveys the halakhic (Jewish legal) distinction being made between prayer time and study time, and emphasizes that 'everyone' refers to rabbinic authorities rather than people in general.

[1] The author refers to a prayer group or society called 'Illuminators of Dawn' (מעירי שחר) that he led or participated in, which focused on morning prayers.

[2] This is a commentary on the Jerusalem Talmud by Rabbi Shmuel Yafeh Ashkenazi (1525-1595). The author cites this as an authoritative source confirming Rashi's explanation.

And they said in Bava Batra, at the end of chapter 5, "For all excellent matters, the ancient is better." And it was said in Berachot, chapter 2, "A person's words before the Holy One, blessed be He, should always be few." And anyone who opposes this is merely disputing the clear truth, for it springs forth from the earth, and I will understand that consumption will declare such a thing.[1]

In the third discourse, there will appear 112 verses corresponding to the numerical value of YaBOK (יב״ק),[2] along with those that follow them, and with them other rectifications and prayers specifically designated to be recited for one whom the world greatly oppresses.[A3] And his soul desires to wrap itself like a garment of light under the wings of the Divine Presence, in precious garments that were prepared for the nefesh, ruach, and neshamah from the union of the King and Queen,[4] from the

[A] Or: "one who is gravely ill and approaching death" — This more explicit translation clarifies the euphemistic Aramaic phrase which literally means 'one whom the world greatly overpowers,' but in context specifically refers to someone critically ill or dying.

[1] This final phrase is somewhat obscure. 'Consumption' (תיכלא) may refer to destruction or disease, suggesting that denying the superiority of ancient wisdom leads to spiritual or intellectual ruin.
[2] This numerological correspondence is significant because the entire book is structured around the metaphor of crossing the Yabok River (מעבר יבק), representing the soul's transition from life to death. The author carefully selected 112 verses to match this number.
[3] This poetic rendering of the Aramaic phrase 'מאן דתקיף ליה עלמא טובא' refers to someone who is critically ill or dying—literally one who is overpowered by the world.
[4] This refers to the kabbalistic concept of the unification of masculine and feminine divine attributes

[i] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Fifth Discourse (Eter Anan HaKetoret) — The author refers to the section he named 'Minchat Aharon' (Aaron's Offering), which is part of the fourth discourse. This section apparently contains a detailed explanation of why scriptural verses are superior for prayer. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Tractate Nedarim — The author cites this Talmudic source to support his claim that proper prayer leads to healing and forgiveness of sins, establishing a traditional basis for his approach to using scriptural verses for healing. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Tractate Yoma — The author cites this source to support his argument about the superiority of earlier authorities, using the colorful expression about fingernails and bellies to emphasize the greater wisdom of earlier generations. | Cf. Jerusalem Talmud, Tractate Shabbat — The author refers to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai's teaching about the relative value of studying Scripture, using this as part of his argument for the importance of scriptural verses in prayer.
[ii] The author is noting that 112 verses will be included, as this is the numerical value of the Hebrew letters YaBOK (יב״ק = 10+2+100=112). This numerological correspondence reinforces the book's central metaphor of crossing the Yabok River as a symbol for the soul's transition at death.
[iii] This Aramaic phrase literally means "one whom the world greatly overpowers" and refers to someone who is critically ill or dying.
[iv] This is kabbalistic terminology referring to the mystical union of the masculine aspect of God (the King, associated with Tiferet) and the feminine aspect (the Queen or Matronita, associated with Malkhut/Shekhinah). In Kabbalah, this divine union generates spiritual energy that creates 'garments' for the soul.

illumination of the commandments of the holy Torah that he planted and sowed in the garden of earth and heaven during the days when he was in this world. And now all those days and years draw near to enter without shame before the Holy King.[1] And there is yet a third part at the end of the fourth discourse, which are perpetual burnt offerings and pure meal offerings, those who bring an offering to the Lord in righteousness evening and morning. And a man who is a priest is involved in all of this. And these herbs are beneficial for the heart and nullify evil thoughts.[A] 1020R 1025R 1030R

Now, our brethren of the House of Israel, listen! Let a little water be taken from the springs of salvation[2]—these are the verses of the Bible along with the expositions that accompany them. Let us place 1035R

[A] Or: "And these spiritual remedies elevate the heart and dispel negative thoughts" — This translation more clearly conveys the metaphorical nature of the statement, as the author is referring to spiritual practices rather than literal herbs, though the metaphor is drawn from medicinal herb traditions.

(Tiferet and Malkhut). In Kabbalah, this union is understood to generate spiritual energy that creates 'garments' for the soul based on one's Torah observance and good deeds.

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic concept that one's Torah study and good deeds create spiritual 'garments' that allow the soul to appear appropriately clothed before God after death, rather than being 'naked' and ashamed.

[2] This opening uses humble language echoing Abraham's hospitality in Genesis 18:4, while employing water as a metaphor for Torah and spiritual sustenance.

[i] This Aramaic phrase describes how one's days and years of Torah observance enable the soul to enter the divine presence 'without shame,' a kabbalistic concept indicating that proper spiritual preparation creates appropriate 'garments' for the soul in the afterlife.

[ii] This is a play on a Talmudic phrase about medicinal herbs that benefit the heart and dispel negative thoughts (Babylonian Talmud, Berakhot 40a). Here, the author is metaphorically suggesting that the spiritual remedies contained in his book have healing properties for the soul.

[iii] Cf. Biblical Jacob's crossing of the Yabok River — The author deliberately invokes Jacob's transformative crossing as a spiritual paradigm for death as a transition rather than an ending. The numerical value of יב״ק (112) becomes a structuring principle for the verses intended to guide the soul across this metaphorical river. | Cf. Union of King and Queen — This is a core Zoharic concept referring to the mystical union between the masculine and feminine aspects of God, which generates spiritual energy and blessing. In this context, it suggests that proper observance of Torah commandments creates spiritual garments for the soul through this divine union. | Cf. Wings of the Divine Presence — This biblical metaphor is reinterpreted in kabbalistic terms as the soul finding refuge within the divine feminine aspect (Shekhinah) after death. It suggests that proper spiritual preparation creates a protected space for the soul. | Cf. Three parts of the soul—nefesh, ruach, and neshamah — This division of the soul into three aspects (vital soul, spirit, and higher soul) is fundamental to kabbalistic psychology. The text suggests that each component receives its own spiritual garment or vessel prepared through Torah observance in this life. | Cf. The garden of earth and heaven — This dual garden metaphor suggests that Torah observance creates spiritual fruits in both this world and heavenly realms, which will sustain the soul after death.

[iv] This is a biblical phrase from Isaiah 12:3, 'wells of salvation,' here referring to scriptural verses as sources of spiritual salvation.

[v] אנ״ך (ANaKh) is an acronym for the three divisions of the Hebrew Bible: Torah (Pentateuch), Nevi'im (Prophets), and Ketuvim (Writings).

[A] Or: "vessels of speech" — The Hebrew 'dovroth' carries a double meaning of both 'rafts/vessels' and 'speech/utterances,' creating a deliberate wordplay that connects floating vessels with spoken words. This alternate translation captures both meanings more explicitly.

[B] Or: "one who is rising from mortal illness" — While the literal translation refers to ascending from earthly depths, contextually this may refer to a person rising from serious illness rather than someone already deceased, as the passage mentions 'the mouth of the ill one' later.

[1] The Hebrew 'dovroth' (דוברות) means 'rafts' but also relates to 'speech,' creating a pun that connects flotation devices with spoken words.

[2] This poetic passage depicts the soul's journey after death, using the feminine Shulamite figure from Song of Songs to represent the soul returning to celestial realms.

[i] Refers to burial societies (chevra kadisha) whose members perform the final acts of kindness for the dead, considered the purest form of kindness since it cannot be reciprocated.

[ii] A reference to the female figure in Song of Songs, here used as a metaphor for the soul. The name derives from 'shalem' (complete/perfect), suggesting the soul's completion through its return to God.

[iii] Alludes to Psalm 68:18, referring to celestial realms with divine chariots and angelic hosts that receive the ascending soul.

[iv] Acronym for 'Garden of Eden' (גן עדן), the traditional Jewish concept of paradise where righteous souls dwell after death.

[A] Or: "the tumult of his heart" — 'Eshtonot' in biblical Hebrew (as in Psalm 146:4) refers to thoughts but carries connotations of troubled or agitated thinking. This translation better captures the emotional turmoil of someone facing death.

[B] Or: "through gestures and subtle signals" — This alternate translation more clearly conveys the practical nature of nonverbal communication methods used by those attending the dying person, who may be unable to understand or respond to speech.

[1] This vivid language reflects the Jewish concept that sin creates spiritual impurity, often metaphorically described as a foul odor that requires cleansing.

[2] This may refer to both the grave and to spiritual traps that might impede the soul's ascent, reflecting the belief that the period immediately after death involves spiritual dangers.

[i] Alludes to Psalm 45:11, 'Forget your people and your father's house,' but inverted to encourage the soul to remember its earthly connections even as it ascends.

[ii] The thirteen principles of faith formulated by Maimonides, considered fundamental tenets of Judaism.

[iii] Acronym for 'Blessed be the name of His glorious kingdom forever and ever' (ברוך שם כבוד מלכותו לעולם ועד), recited after the first verse of the Shema.

Moreover, you will depart amidst the joy of Torah and holiness and the conversations between the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Divine Presence. And if one merits to fulfill Torah even at the moment of death, his soul will ascend through those paths and trails that are in the Torah,[1] as Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai explained in Parshat Vayishlach, page 182b. And how many talents of nard for the Master who has purified you![2] For the language of the sages is blessing, the language of the sages is wealth, the language of the sages is healing, as they said in Ketubot, chapter 12. [A] Or: "we will create for him a spiritual reality that will sustain his eternal life" — This Aramaic

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic concept that Torah study creates spiritual pathways through which the soul can ascend to higher realms, especially relevant at the moment of death.

[2] This poetic expression, using the valuable perfume 'nard' from Song of Songs, suggests that the words of Torah sages are precious spiritual treasures that benefit the departing soul.

[i] Rabbinic name for Psalm 91, traditionally recited for protection against harmful forces, especially relevant during the vulnerable time of death.

[ii] An Aramaic phrase from the Zohar referring to God and His Divine Presence, representing the masculine and feminine aspects of divinity in Kabbalistic thought.

[iii] Acronym for Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, the 2nd century sage traditionally considered the author of the Zohar, the primary text of Jewish mysticism.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Opening Section — This passage reveals the core purpose of Ma'avar Yabok as a practical guide for those attending to the dying, providing them with specific verses and prayers to recite that will help the departing soul transition to the afterlife. | Cf. Zohar, Parshat Vayishlach — The author cites this Zohar passage to establish the kabbalistic foundation for his claim that souls who engage with Torah even at death will ascend through spiritual pathways created by Torah study. | Cf. Talmud, Ketubot — The author cites this Talmudic source to emphasize that the words of Torah sages provide blessing, wealth, and healing, reinforcing why reciting their teachings benefits the dying. | Cf. Song of Songs — The author transforms the Shulamite figure from Song of Songs into a representation of the human soul returning to its divine source, reframing the erotic biblical poetry into a mystical description of the soul's journey after death. | Cf. Psalm 91 — The author includes Psalm 91, traditionally recited for protection against harmful forces, as one of the key protective prayers to be recited for the dying person, reflecting the belief that the moment of death involves spiritual dangers requiring divine protection. | Cf. Psalm 3 — The author prescribes Psalm 3 as part of the liturgy for the dying, using its theme of divine deliverance from numerous enemies as a metaphor for the soul's deliverance from physical suffering and spiritual adversaries at death.

Concerning the reward for those who serve God and perform His will in this world, the Midrash Song of Songs (page 23b) states: "Whoever engages in Torah study in this world will not be permitted to sleep even in the World to Come. Instead, they will be led to the study houses of Shem, Eber, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and Aaron. To what extent? Until 'you will make for yourself a great name,[1] like the name of the great ones who are in the earth.'"

They also said in Chapter Chelek: "Sing daily, recite daily," for Rabbi Akiva would say: "Review your learning even though it is already organized in your mouth, like a song, and this will cause you to be in the World to Come with joy and songs."

Further, on page 26, regarding the verse "There are sixty queens,"[2] these represent sixty groups of righteous ones who sit in the Garden of Eden beneath the Tree of Life studying Torah. "And eighty concubines" refers to eighty intermediate groups who dwell and engage in Torah beneath the Tree of Life. "And maidens without number" indicates there is no limit to the number of students there. All of them expound from the same reasoning, from the same law, from the same gezera shava (textual analogy),[3] from the same kal vachomer (logical deduction).[4] How fortunate is one who merits to spread Torah among the public[A] for its own sake and establishes worthy students in this world.

They further stated that all the Torah a person learns in this world is mere vapor compared to the Torah of the World to Come.[B] This is because now phrase uses the term 'milta' which can mean 'word/thing/matter' but in kabbalistic contexts often refers to creating spiritual realities through speech. This translation better captures the mystical concept of how reciting sacred texts creates eternal spiritual sustenance.

[A] Or: "to teach Torah to the masses" — The phrase 'להרביץ תורה' is an idiom specifically referring to teaching Torah rather than just spreading it. This alternate translation better captures the active educational aspect implied in the Hebrew.

[B] Or: "is like a breath compared to the Torah of the World to Come" — The Hebrew word 'hevel' (הבל) literally means 'breath' or 'vapor' and is used metaphorically to indicate something transitory or of minimal substance compared to something greater. Either translation conveys the meaning, but 'breath' might be more literally accurate.

[1] This is a reference to God's promise to Abraham in Genesis 12:2.

[2] This refers to Song of Songs 6:8, which reads: 'There are sixty queens and eighty concubines, and maidens without number.'

[3] Gezera shava is one of the traditional hermeneutical principles in rabbinic interpretation, where similar words in different contexts are used to derive legal principles.

[4] Kal vachomer is a form of a fortiori argument in rabbinic literature, reasoning from a lesser case to a greater one.

[i] This doesn't mean that Torah study in this world is worthless, but rather that the wisdom accessible in this world is limited compared to what will be revealed in the World to Come.

ובנובלות חכמה של מעלה[i] אך שם יעסקו הצדיקים בחמדה גנוזה ובחכמה של מעלה לא בנובלות. ברם זאת התורה היא השער לה׳ וממנה יזכו הצדיקים לחמדה גנוזה כמשל המדרש[ii]

our engagement is only with "vessels of desire" and with the "fallen fruit" of the supernal wisdom, but there the righteous will engage with the "hidden treasure" and with the supernal wisdom itself, not merely its fallen fruit. Nevertheless, this Torah is the gateway to the Lord, and through it the righteous will merit the hidden treasure, as in the parable of the Midrash.

It is like one who honors a king traveling in the desert[1] with a basket of dried figs and a cask of wine; the king says, "This is a great honor," etc. And in chapter Chelek, they said: "Whoever blackens his face in this world for the sake of Torah study,[2] the Holy One, blessed be He, makes his radiance shine in the World to Come." Similarly, "Whoever starves himself for Torah in this world, the Holy One, blessed be He, will satisfy him in the World to Come," as it is said, "They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of Your house," etc. And there, Rabbi Chiya said regarding the verse, "I made myself pools of water": This refers to expositions, which are called thus because they flow with many teachings and various insights.[3] Whenever a person contemplates them be-

[1]This opens with a parable from the Talmud about how even modest offerings are valued in contexts of need, establishing the theme that seemingly small acts of Torah study or charity have great spiritual value.

[2]This metaphorical expression refers to suffering or self-denial for Torah study, including the willingness to appear foolish by asking questions or the physical hardship of studying in difficult conditions.

[3]The text uses water imagery throughout—flowing teachings, pools, springs—creating an extended metaphor comparing Torah wisdom to water that nourishes and sustains, culminating in the 'waters of supernal Eden.'

[i]The term 'noblot chochma' (fallen fruit of wisdom) comes from rabbinic literature (Bereishit Rabbah 17:5), where it is stated that the Torah of this world is merely the fallen fruit of the supernal wisdom.

[ii]Cf. Song of Songs Rabbah — The text uses this midrash to demonstrate the hierarchical structure of Torah scholars in the afterlife, showing that merit gained through Torah study in this world creates different levels of status in the World to Come. | Cf. Talmud Bavli — This reference establishes the importance of consistent Torah study as preparation for spiritual rewards in the afterlife, emphasizing that the habit of regular review transforms learning into something melodious and joyful.

[iii]This is a truncated quote from a Talmudic passage in Sanhedrin where a king traveling in the desert appreciates even modest offerings (dried figs and wine). The author uses 'etc.' (וכו׳) since the audience would know the full passage.

[iv]Refers to 'Perek Chelek,' the eleventh chapter of Tractate Sanhedrin, which discusses the World to Come and is a major source for discussions of reward and punishment in rabbinic literature.

[v]Literally 'whoever blackens his face in this world for words of Torah,' a Talmudic expression describing one who suffers or struggles in Torah study, either through self-denial or the social embarrassment of asking questions.

[vi]From Psalm 36:9, 'They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of Your house.' The full verse continues, 'and You shall make them drink from the river of Your delights,' which connects to the later reference to 'the waters of supernal Eden.'

fore many people, he becomes like a flowing spring, each according to his understanding. And they said in the Midrash Mishlei: "Whoever produces words of Torah and teaches them publicly, I too, at a favorable time, will grant him his desire." 1175R

And surely, they will obtain favor from the Lord in heaven[A]—each one among the members of the charitable society or others from the congregation who gather in the house of the sick person to welcome the Divine Presence that precedes and arrives.[1] Their intention is also to bestow good kindnesses from the supernal treasury upon the one lying on the sickbed and to awaken great mercies from the supreme will for this suffering soul whose path is in storm and tempest.[2] They are united there, joined together in unity and vision[B] to bring it under the wings of the Divine Presence and to shelter it under the shadow of the Tree of Life. 1180R 1185R 1190R

And for each one of them, after long days and years of life, thousands upon thousands of holy multitudes will accompany their souls,[3] and at the time of their departure, they will flash like lightning, and He will seat them forever and exalt them. For this righteousness of theirs will stand for them eternally, and from the flow of the waters of the supernal Eden, a table will be set before them. The Lord will continually satisfy them with the showbread, and they shall eat and have plenty, 1195R 1200R

[A] Or: "they will elicit favor from the Lord in heaven" — The Hebrew verb 'יפיקו' carries the sense of drawing out or eliciting, which more precisely captures the active role these individuals play in generating divine favor through their actions.

[B] Or: "bound together in unified purpose and shared vision" — This rendering better captures the Aramaic terms 'באחדותא וחיזותא' which emphasize both the purposeful unity and the shared spiritual perception of those gathered around the sick person.

[1] This references a Talmudic teaching that the Divine Presence (Shekhinah) arrives at the bedside of the sick before the visitor does, elevating the act of visiting the sick from mere human kindness to a divine encounter.

[2] This poetic description of the suffering soul uses biblical imagery of divine power manifesting in storms, suggesting that the sick person's suffering has spiritual significance rather than being random misfortune.

[3] The text describes the eschatological reward for those who perform acts of kindness, promising divine accompaniment in the afterlife similar to how they accompanied the sick in this world—a spiritual application of the 'measure for measure' principle.

[i] A reference to the Talmudic teaching (Shabbat 127a) that when one visits the sick, the Divine Presence arrives before them. The Aramaic phrase 'דקדמא ואתיא' means 'that precedes and arrives.'

[ii] An allusion to Nahum 1:3, 'The Lord has His way in the whirlwind and in the storm.' Here applied to the soul's difficult journey during illness.

[iii] An allusion to Ezekiel 1:14, 'And the living creatures ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning,' which describes the angels in Ezekiel's vision. Here it refers to the souls of the righteous.

just as they many times satisfied the yearning soul and filled the hungry soul with goodness[A]—and "goodness" refers only to Torah.[1] Thus, may the Lord put His spirit upon them, for He does not withhold the reward of any creature, and the principle of "measure for measure" has not been abolished. 1205R

And they too shall flee from sorrow and sighing, and shall not fear the day of trouble and rebuke, for He will entreat for them and save them. Moreover, their intention in attending to the needs of the deceased, as presented in these discourses—properly arranged and accepted in every detail—shall be considered as incense and shall be a pleasing fragrance.[2] This was truly one of the primary intentions I had in mind, as the reader will see with his eyes and understand in his heart from the introductions that will be explained in much greater detail than what is written within them. 1210R 1215R 1220R

This shall be the fruit of their commandment: the principal shall be preserved, enduring, and stored for [A] Or: "quenched the thirsting soul and satisfied the hungry soul with goodness" — The Hebrew 'שוקקה' can also carry connotations of thirst rather than general yearning, which would create a more parallel structure with 'hungry' in the second part of the phrase and maintain the water imagery present throughout the passage.

[1] This interpretive formula (known as 'ein...ela') is a rabbinic hermeneutic method that restricts the meaning of a term to a specific interpretation. Here, it connects the 'goodness' with which they filled others to Torah, which they will receive as reward.

[2] This imagery draws on the biblical concept of sacrifices being a 'pleasing fragrance' (ריח ניחוח) to God. Here, proper care for the deceased is metaphorically elevated to the status of Temple offerings, suggesting it has similar spiritual efficacy.

[i] A rabbinic interpretive formula stating 'good' (טוב) refers specifically to Torah, based on Proverbs 4:2, 'For I give you good doctrine; do not forsake my Torah.' There appears to be a scribal error in the text, writing 'נווב' instead of 'טוב' (good).

[ii] Cf. Sanhedrin 100a — The opening reference to honoring a king with figs and wine is quoted from this Talmudic passage, which discusses how even modest offerings can be greatly valued when given in circumstances of need. | Cf. Sanhedrin 100a — The statements about 'blackening one's face' and 'starving oneself' for Torah study are direct quotes from this Talmudic passage, which describes the rewards awaiting those who sacrifice physical comfort for spiritual growth. | Cf. Psalms 36:9 — The verse 'They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of Your house' is quoted to demonstrate the divine reward awaiting those who dedicate themselves to Torah study. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 2:6 — The reference to 'I made myself pools of water' alludes to this verse from Ecclesiastes, which Rabbi Chiya interprets metaphorically as referring to Torah expositions. | Cf. Zohar — The language about the Divine Presence (Shekhinah), unity, and the Tree of Life reflects Zoharic terminology and concepts about the soul's journey and divine emanations. | Cf. Berakhot 63b — The principle of 'measure for measure' (midah k'neged midah) is a fundamental concept in rabbinic thought about divine justice, referenced here to explain how those who care for others will receive similar care.

And when they lie down to sleep [die], they will merit that the souls they accompanied with holy words will come forth to meet them, as Rabbi Yochanan said in the Tractate Ta'anit: "When I die, Rabbi Hoshaya will come out to accompany me because I explained the Mishnah according to his interpretation."[2] Similarly, Ramban said in the last chapter of Bava Kamma that he was assured that the Rif would come to meet him at his death. And it was also said to Rabbi Joseph Karo that Maimonides would come to meet him, along with other righteous ones for whom he had provided spiritual satisfaction in this world. [A] Or: "This shall be the fruit of their mitzvah: the principal amount shall be safeguarded, maintained, and reserved for them in the World to Come" — This alternate preserves the financial metaphor more explicitly with 'principal amount' and uses the untranslated term 'mitzvah' which might better convey the specifically Jewish religious concept involved.

[1] I've translated this complex kabbalistic reference directly. The 'lattices' refers to openings between spiritual worlds, and the reference to the 'third chamber' and 'southern side' reflects the detailed mystical geography of heavenly realms in Jewish mysticism.

[2] This reflects the rabbinic belief that souls of the righteous welcome others in the afterlife, particularly those who propagated their teachings. The translation preserves the casual, conversational tone of Rabbi Yochanan's statement.

[i] This employs traditional rabbinic terminology for spiritual reward, drawing on the Mishnaic concept that certain mitzvot provide 'fruit' in this world while the 'principal' (קרן) is preserved for the World to Come.

[ii] This refers to kabbalistic cosmology where the heavenly realm is organized into chambers (היכלות). The term 'lattices' (חרכים) alludes to Song of Songs 2:9 ('peering through the lattices') and in mystical literature refers to openings between spiritual worlds.

[iii] This refers to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, the traditional author of the Zohar, and specifically to the section of the Zohar that comments on the Torah portion Pekudei (Exodus 38:21-40:38), which contains extensive discussions of celestial realms.

[iv] This is a reference to Talmud Ta'anit 9a, where Rabbi Yochanan expresses his expectation that Rabbi Hoshaya would come to welcome him in the afterlife because Rabbi Yochanan frequently explained Mishnayot according to Rabbi Hoshaya's interpretation.

[v] This refers to a tradition about Nachmanides (Ramban) stating that Rabbi Isaac Alfasi (the Rif) would greet him in the afterlife. The 'last chapter of Bava Kamma' refers to the final chapter of that Talmudic tractate.

[vi] This refers to a tradition about Rabbi Joseph Karo, author of the Shulchan Aruch, that Maimonides (Rambam) would come to greet him in the afterlife along with other righteous figures whose works he had studied and explained.

verse "as you have done with the dead"—that you attended to their prayers.[1] According to our interpretation, it will be explained that those who stand by the deceased with holy conversation at the time when his spirit and soul are gathered to God—certainly by 1250R
the merit of their pleasant words—spread a purple garment over him and wrap his soul within it[A] so that it will not be frightened and pushed away by the external forces that gather there with the Angel of Death,[2] some of which come to cling to his body 1255R which was a sheath of holiness.

And there Rabbi Ze'ira said in the name of Resh Lakish: "This scroll [of Ruth] contains neither impurity nor purity, neither prohibition nor permission—why then was it written? To teach how great is the 1260R reward for those who perform acts of kindness." And in the Midrash Kohelet, Rabbi Judah said:[3] "Whoever denies acts of loving-kindness is as if he denies the Torah." And regarding the verse "and the living shall take it to heart"—this refers to the Eter- 1265R nal Living One who rewards a person for every step taken in performing acts of loving-kindness. And in the Midrash Tehillim, page 44a, Rabbi Joshua said: "Kindness extends from one world to the next, but [A] Or: "spread a royal purple garment over him and enfold his soul within it" — This alternate translation emphasizes the royal associations of the purple garment (suggesting dignity and honor) and uses 'enfold' which might better capture the protective, embracing quality of the action described.

[1] This is interpreting the phrase 'נטפלתם בתפלותיהם' which literally means 'you attached yourselves to their prayers' or 'you busied yourselves with their prayers.' It refers to praying for the deceased or attending to prayers related to burial rituals.

[2] The term 'external forces' (החיצונים) refers to negative spiritual entities in kabbalistic thought. The passage describes a spiritual battle at the moment of death, with proper ritual creating protection for the departing soul.

[3] Throughout this passage, the author is building a theological argument about the importance of attending to the deceased by citing multiple authoritative sources from rabbinic literature, showing how this act of kindness carries eternal spiritual rewards.

[i] The imagery of wrapping the soul in a purple garment draws on both royal symbolism (purple being associated with royalty) and kabbalistic concepts of 'garments of the soul' that protect it during its journey through spiritual realms.

[ii] In kabbalistic terminology, 'chitzonim' (חיצונים/external ones) refers to negative spiritual forces. 'Malakha d'mota' is Aramaic for 'the angel of death.' This reflects the belief that both the angel of death and negative forces are present at the time of death.

[iii] This quote about the Book of Ruth is from the Midrash Ruth Rabbah 2:14, highlighting that despite lacking legal content about ritual purity and impurity, Ruth teaches about the value of kindness.

[iv] ג״ח is an abbreviation for 'gemilut chasadim' (גמילות חסדים), acts of loving-kindness. This teaching emphasizes that denying the importance of kindness is equivalent to denying the Torah itself.

[v] This creatively reinterprets Ecclesiastes 7:2 ('the living will take it to heart') by suggesting that 'the living' refers to God (חי העולמים/the Eternal Living One), who rewards acts of kindness.

And in Psalm 118, regarding the verse "Open for me the gates of righteousness,"[B] [it is taught that] in the World to Come, they ask a person, "What was your occupation?"[1] And he replies, "I fed the hungry," and they tell him, "This is the gate for those who fed the hungry—enter through it." And likewise for those who raised orphans, those who performed acts of kindness, and so for all commandments. Behold, we have seen the great crown of gold which the King, Sovereign of the Universe, has established[C] for those who perform acts of kindness in this world with 1275R 1280R

[A] Or: "Kindness [endures] from world to world, but charity [only lasts] for three generations" — This alternate translation more literally renders the Hebrew phrase 'from world to world' (מן העולם ועד העולם), which has the connotation of eternal duration rather than specifically referring to this world and the next.

[B] Or: "Open for me the gates of righteousness in the World to Come" — This alternate translation incorporates 'leh'olam haba' (לעה״ב) directly into the verse, making explicit that the gates mentioned are in the afterlife, rather than treating it as a separate phrase. However, the original translation is preferred because it maintains the biblical verse's wording, with the World to Come reference functioning as a contextual specification.

[C] Or: "the magnificent golden crown which the King, Sovereign of the Universe, has prepared" — This alternate translation uses 'magnificent' for 'גדולה' and 'prepared' for 'יסד', which might better convey the sense of divine preparation of rewards. However, the original translation more literally represents the Hebrew text.

[1] The question uses 'occupation' (מלאכתך) in a spiritual sense, referring not to one's profession but to one's primary spiritual activity or focus during life.

[i] This teaching contrasts chesed (kindness) with tzedakah (charity), suggesting that the spiritual rewards of acts of kindness extend eternally ('from world to world'), while the merit of financial charity extends only for three generations.

[ii] Cf. Zohar, Pekudei — The author is citing the Zohar as an authoritative source to support his claim about the specific spiritual rewards awaiting those who properly care for the dead. This reinforces the text's kabbalistic framework while providing doctrinal support for the practices he advocates. | Cf. Talmud, Ta'anit 9a — By citing this Talmudic passage, the author establishes a prestigious precedent for the concept that souls of the righteous will greet those who honored their teachings. This forms part of his argument about the reciprocal spiritual relationship between the living and the deceased. | Cf. Book of Ruth — The author uses this midrashic interpretation to support his emphasis on prayer and proper speech around the dying. This interpretation transforms Ruth from a narrative about loyalty to a source text for proper ritual practices surrounding death. | Cf. Song of Songs 2:9 — The term 'lattices' (חרכים) is drawn from this biblical verse but reinterpreted in kabbalistic literature to represent openings between spiritual worlds. This exemplifies how the author incorporates biblical imagery into a mystical cosmological framework. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 7:2 — The author creatively reinterprets this verse by suggesting that 'the living' refers to God Himself (the Eternal Living One), who rewards acts of kindness. This demonstrates the author's approach of finding mystical meanings in straightforward biblical texts.

[iii] This quote from Psalm 118:19 is reinterpreted here in an eschatological context, with the 'gates of righteousness' referring to entrances to the World to Come, rather than to the Temple as in the original context.

[iv] An abbreviation for 'אומרים לו' (they say to him).

[v] The metaphor of a 'great crown of gold' draws on royal imagery to describe divine reward, suggesting that those who perform acts of kindness are treated with royal honor in the afterlife.

both the living and the dead.[1] We find regarding the verse "For I desire kindness and not sacrifice" that Rabbi Yochanan said to Rabbi Yehoshua, who had lamented, "Woe to us for the destruction of the Temple, the place where our ancestors achieved atonement." He replied to him, "My son, do not be distressed, for we have one form of atonement that is equivalent to it[A]—and what is that? Acts of loving-kindness."[2]

My heart rejoiced greatly[B] during the few days I spent in the praised Mantua,[C] within that holy community, a mother city among the communities of Italy.[3] Certainly, besides the fact that the entire congregation is holy and encompasses all levels of distinguished lineage, the splendor of the faith, and the land shines with the honor of the sages who sit in judgment—may God protect them collectively and [A] Or: "for we have another means of atonement that serves the same purpose" — This alternate translation emphasizes the functional equivalence of loving-kindness to Temple sacrifice, rather than just their comparability. However, the original translation more accurately reflects the Hebrew wording.

[B] Or: "My innermost being exulted, yes exulted" — The Hebrew 'בני מעי' literally refers to 'the children of my innards' or 'my internal organs,' a Biblical Hebrew idiom for one's deepest feelings. This more literal translation preserves the poetic Hebrew expression.

[C] Or: "in the lauded Mantua" — The term 'המהוללה' can be translated as 'lauded' which might better convey the formal praise being given to the city.

[1] This phrase is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok, as it emphasizes that true loving-kindness extends beyond the living to proper treatment of the dying and deceased, a central theme of the book.

[2] The Hebrew term גמ״ח (gemilut chasadim) encompasses a broader range of actions than the English 'kindness' suggests, including material assistance, personal involvement, and spiritual support for both the living and the dead.

[3] The phrase 'עיר ואם' (literally 'city and mother') is a biblical expression (2 Samuel 20:19) referring to an important city that serves as a center or capital for surrounding communities.

[i] This quote from Hosea 6:6 becomes particularly significant after the Temple's destruction, as it provides biblical support for the idea that kindness can replace sacrifice as a means of atonement.

[ii] This teaching about acts of kindness serving as a substitute for Temple sacrifice is especially meaningful in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which focuses on proper treatment of the dying and deceased as forms of loving-kindness.

[iii] Cf. Psalm 118:19 — The verse 'Open for me the gates of righteousness' is being interpreted mystically as referring to the entrance to the World to Come, with different gates corresponding to different virtuous acts performed in life. | Cf. Hosea 6:6 — The verse 'For I desire kindness and not sacrifice' is used to establish that acts of loving-kindness can substitute for Temple sacrifices as a means of atonement. | Cf. Avot de-Rabbi Natan — The dialogue between Rabbi Yochanan and Rabbi Yehoshua resembles teachings in Avot de-Rabbi Natan about substitutes for Temple atonement. | Cf. Talmud Bavli — The Talmudic discussion that acts of loving-kindness are superior to sacrifice because they can be performed with both one's person and one's money, and benefit both the living and the dead.

[iv] Mantua was an important center of Jewish learning and culture in northern Italy during the Renaissance and early modern period. The city had a significant Jewish population and was known for its rabbinical scholarship.

individually and elevate them ever higher. I particularly observed there how proper their deeds are 1300R and how upright their ways in the construction of their cemetery courts[1] and in the charitable burial societies there. Even though many of them have not studied Mishnah and Talmud, and not everyone is learned in the law, nevertheless they engage in this 1305R great commandment with longing souls.[2] While visiting there, I heard in their name that for some time their souls had greatly desired that someone from the congregation would establish and arrange for them orderly services to raise their voices in joyful prayer 1310R at the time of a soul's departure. And since the God of the spirits of all flesh does not withhold good from those who walk in integrity, and He fulfills the desire of those who fear Him, He arranged and brought it about that this matter which began with the great 1315R ones concluded with one small in both quantity and quality[A]—none other than myself, the lowly among thousands, Aaron Berechia of Modena.[3]

[A] Or: "that this matter which was initiated by the great ones ended up being completed by one insignificant in both stature and ability" — This alternate translation better captures the extreme self-deprecation the author is expressing, which is a common rhetorical device in rabbinic literature.

[1] The 'construction of cemetery courts' refers to the physical infrastructure for burial grounds, which in Jewish tradition required proper organization and maintenance as a sign of respect for the dead.

[2] The phrase 'בנפש נכספה' indicates a deep spiritual yearning or desire, suggesting that even those without formal religious education participated in burial societies out of genuine spiritual motivation rather than mere social obligation.

[3] The author signs his name with extreme humility, referring to himself as 'המך באלפי' (the lowly among thousands), which is a common rhetorical device in rabbinic literature where authors present themselves as unworthy while undertaking important religious work.

[i] The 'charitable burial societies' (chevra kadisha) were organizations responsible for preparing bodies for burial according to Jewish law and tradition. These societies were considered especially holy because they performed acts of kindness (washing, dressing, and burying the dead) that could never be reciprocated.

[ii] The author notes that many members of these burial societies were not formally educated in Mishnah and Talmud. This suggests that participation in burial societies was open to ordinary members of the community, not just scholars, which was typical of Italian Jewish communities.

[iii] The community desired organized prayer services specifically for the moment of death. In Jewish tradition, proper prayers and practices at this moment were considered crucial for helping the soul transition to the afterlife.

[iv] Aaron Berechia of Modena (c. 1550-1639) was an Italian rabbi and kabbalist, author of Ma'avar Yabok. He should not be confused with his more famous contemporary Leon (Judah Aryeh) Modena, though both were from the same city.

[v] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok introduction — This passage parallels the book's introduction, as both explain

When they heard that their heart's desire had been granted to them, at least in part, they did not examine from whose mind these words came, and they sought from a man who has no knowledge. Yet they constantly entreated me with a spirit of grace and supplication.[A] But this is the day we have hoped for[1]—we have found and seen Your works! May He grant us the privilege to visit the King's palaces and to establish proper intentions for the work of acts of kindness.[2] Quickly, hasten Your works! The arrangement that You have arranged, please place before us[B]—whether it is rich or lean, whether like a court's meal or Solomon's feast. Proceed! Proceed! For we trust that from your soul's labor we shall be satisfied with an abundance of joy, both we and you, for length of days.

And what can an individual do among the many? Even though the clusters of my writings have not yet ripened,[3] and in my eyes it seemed like a dish not [A] Or: "And they gave me no rest, continually appealing with a spirit of grace and supplication" — The phrase 'אל דמי להם' could also be understood as 'they gave no rest' or 'they were not silent to me,' which might better capture the sense of persistent entreaty. This alternate translation emphasizes the continuous nature of their requests.

[B] Or: "And Your evaluation which You have assessed, please set before us" — The Hebrew 'ערך' can mean both 'arrangement' and 'evaluation/assessment,' and the context could support either reading. This alternate translation emphasizes the evaluative aspect rather than the organizational one.

[1] The author shifts between pronouns, addressing both God directly and speaking of the community collectively, creating a complex rhetorical style that blends prayer with personal narrative.

[2] This refers specifically to the holy work of caring for the dying and deceased, which is the central concern of Ma'avar Yabok. The 'proper intentions' mentioned refer to the kabbalistic concept that ritual actions must be performed with specific spiritual intentions to be fully effective.

[3] The author employs agricultural metaphors to express his sense that his work is not yet fully matured or perfected, reflecting his humility about the text's quality.

the author's humble acceptance of a task that seemed beyond his abilities. The author consistently presents himself as unworthy but divinely guided to undertake important spiritual work for his community. | Cf. Psalm 51:10 — The author's phrase "ששו בני מעי" (my innards rejoiced) echoes biblical expressions of deep emotional and spiritual feelings, similar to how Psalm 51 locates spiritual experience in the heart. This suggests the author experienced his time in Mantua as a profound spiritual event, not merely a pleasant visit. | Cf. Zohar on death rituals — The author's mention of 'raising voices in joyful prayer at the time of a soul's departure' alludes to kabbalistic understandings (as found in the Zohar) about how proper prayer at death facilitates the soul's journey. This frames these rituals within mystical Jewish tradition rather than merely as community customs.

[i] This includes an Aramaic phrase 'ומגברא דלית ליה דיעה קא בעו' meaning 'and they sought from a man who has no knowledge,' reflecting the author's self-deprecating style.

[ii] G"CH is an abbreviation for 'gemilut chasadim' (acts of kindness), specifically referring to the charitable work of caring for the dying and deceased, which is the central focus of Ma'avar Yabok.

[iii] B"D is an abbreviation for 'beit din' (court), referring to a simple, moderate meal that would be appropriate for a court setting, contrasted with the lavish feast of King Solomon.

[iv] This appears to be an emphatic repetition, possibly of Aramaic origin, encouraging proceeding forward with the work despite its perceived imperfections.

[1] This refers to members of the burial society (Chevra Kadisha) who care for the dying and prepare bodies for burial, considered one of the most sacred duties in Jewish communal life.

[2] The author sees his writing as serving both practical and spiritual purposes: providing guidance for proper ritual performance while also elevating the spiritual status of those who perform these sacred duties.

[i] This references a Talmudic saying (Hagigah 9b): 'One who reviews his learning 100 times cannot be compared to one who reviews it 101 times.' The author uses 'etc.' (וכו׳) because this was a well-known saying to his audience.

[ii] Abbreviation for 'mikol makom' (nevertheless).

[iii] An Aramaic expression from the Talmud (Yevamot 103b) literally meaning 'rubs in, rubs out,' describing someone who moves smoothly and humbly between places or roles without causing friction or drawing attention.

[iv] This alludes to Numbers 16:29, referring to death as 'the final summons of all men,' appropriate in a text dealing with care for the dying.

[v] This refers to 'the remnants of the people,' an expression from Isaiah 1:9 and Joel 3:5 that refers to the righteous few who remain faithful.

[vi] This term refers to unique, treasured individuals of special spiritual or moral worth, commonly used in rabbinic literature to describe people of exceptional virtue.

[vii] An Aramaic expression meaning 'neither feels pain nor suffers,' used to describe someone who experiences no discomfort or hardship from a particular situation.

[viii] This alludes to Psalms 16:6, 'The lines have fallen for me in pleasant places; indeed, I have a beautiful inheritance,' describing the spiritual benefits that come to those who serve in this holy society.

[ix] This concluding phrase comes from Leviticus 26:6, describing the blessing of peace without fear, a common closing formula in blessings and prayers.

[x] Cf. Talmud Hagigah 9b — The author uses this reference to justify why his work might benefit from further refinement while also suggesting that he is presenting it despite its imperfections, for the sake of heaven and to benefit the community. | Cf. Numbers 16:29 — By referencing this passage about death, the author reminds readers of the universal mortality that makes Ma'avar Yabok's guidance on death rituals relevant to everyone, especially those in the burial society who will face this 'final summons.' | Cf. Leviticus 26:6 — The author concludes with this biblical blessing formula to express his wish that those who perform the sacred duties of caring for the dying and dead will be rewarded with divine protection and peace.

Based on these words, I made a covenant with them and promised to bring my good intentions from potential to action. I declared, "See that I have come, 1360R see that I have come,"[A] for we do not delay the fulfillment of commandments. I ran sixty runs[B] until I understood how to begin the work, which is more than half the battle.[1] I will sing to the Lord for He has dealt bountifully with me.[2] God knows, and Is- 1365R rael too knows, that I could not set my eyes on this work of mine, even to create a first draft as I had intended. The words of truth are recognizable in the language of the book, for it is as one person speaking to another, without ornamentation of words. I 1370R combined early and late sources as one,[C] according to what my pen produced at first writing, when it was not possible to pursue elegant discourse but only to ensure that the words would be spoken truthfully according to the words of Torah and rabbinic teach- 1375R ings.

Whatever happens, I trust in God's kindness that there will be nothing in them unacceptable to all the words of our Sages of blessed memory. I do not say things I do not understand,[D] for I have kept to my 1380R path and have not turned right or left after any opinions of the philosophers, for my soul has distanced itself from many of their ways, and my honor shall not join with them. I have not written the letter vav on a prescription tablet,[E] for the knowledge from 1385R the lips of our Sages speaks clearly, and anyone who walks in their ways will know peace, if only he is worthy of it.

[A] Or: "Behold I have arrived, behold I have arrived" — This Aramaic phrase could be translated more dramatically to capture the declarative nature of the announcement.

[B] Or: "I hastened with sixty rushes" — This Aramaic expression describes intense effort and speed, and this alternate translation might better capture the metaphorical sense of urgency and exertion.

[C] Or: "not like one who embellishes his words with decorations. I poured out early and late teachings together" — This is a difficult phrase with metaphorical language about literary style, and this alternate captures the imagery of 'pouring out' (יצק) teachings without artificial embellishment.

[D] Or: "I do not speak of things beyond my comprehension" — This Aramaic phrase expresses the author's commitment to intellectual honesty, and this alternative might better capture his determination to stay within the bounds of what he truly comprehends.

[E] Or: "I have not written even a single letter vav on a prescription tablet" — This is an idiomatic expression likely referring to writing something without proper authority or knowledge. The alternate emphasizes the minimal nature of the letter vav to strengthen the metaphor.

[1] The Hebrew phrase "יותר מחצי הכל" (more than half of everything) references the Jewish principle that beginning a mitzvah is the hardest part and constitutes more than half the work.

[2] This phrase echoes Psalm 13:6, "I will sing unto the LORD, because he hath dealt bountifully with me," connecting the author's gratitude to biblical expressions of thanksgiving.

A person should consider his path and refine his words before uttering them, for the School of Elijah taught that the Holy One, blessed be He, sat and expounded, examined and refined the entire Torah.[1] Everything that is part of Torah's words, He expounds, investigates, and refines 248 times, corresponding to the 248 limbs in a person, and only afterward does He bring it forth from His mouth and establish it in the Torah, as it is said, "The words of the Lord are pure words." And they said in the Midrash: This teaches that the Holy One, blessed be He, taught Moses counsel and knowledge, and gave them to him in truth, wrote them for him in truth, and made them known to him in truth, so that he might go and announce them to Israel in truth. This is the meaning of "to make you know the certainty of truthful words."

The Sage, author of the Akedah, wrote in Gate 25 that the intellect is obligated to deny some of its judgments[2] and decisions because of the divine instructions emanating upon it. And we, recipients of God's Torah, do not need the premises required by the philosophers[3] to explain the existence, unity, and simplicity of God, which the Rambam mentioned at the beginning of Part II [of the Guide for the Perplexed], for the Lord our God has shown us His glory and His greatness at the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai.

Furthermore, due to lack of time, many corrections that I added in the margin day by day, as God's name was in my mouth, some of them were not placed as precisely in the place where they should have been. Besides, many things relevant to this work that are renewed and emerge daily did not make it into writing. May it be His will that we merit to live, and perhaps, without making a vow,[4] we shall still express our thoughts, God willing, to merit according to the thoughts of our heart to learn and to

[1] The author describes God's meticulous process of refining Torah teachings 248 times (corresponding to the traditional number of limbs in the human body) before revealing them, establishing a divine model of careful composition that the author tries to emulate.

[2] This references the Jewish philosophical position that human reason must sometimes yield to divine revelation, particularly when they appear to conflict. The author cites Rabbi Isaac Arama's 'Sefer HaAkedah' to support this view.

[3] The author is specifically contrasting his mystical approach with that of Maimonides' 'Guide for the Perplexed,' suggesting that philosophical proofs for God's existence are unnecessary for those who accept the direct revelation at Sinai.

[4] The phrase "בלא נדר" (without a vow) is a traditional rabbinic qualifier when expressing an intention to do something in the future, avoiding the serious religious implications of making and potentially breaking a formal vow.

And now, I implore you, venerable rabbis, or you, my colleagues who are like my own soul, who read with love the sheets of my scroll, please do not place blame on me if perhaps you find some matters not so beautifully connected in some places, for everything is for the sake of Heaven, permitted and allowed, and "patience, patience is worth four hundred zuz." And if you find any error in it, I beg you, do not profane it,[1] but rather teach and instruct me, for it is Torah, and I need to learn. I will make my ear like a funnel to hear the words of the sages and their riddles. And if I have lengthened my response in this introduction, which is not my usual way, my intention was to awaken hearts. Do not say, "We see a city dweller here,"[2] for I have not done so in the words of the book itself, as it contains no excess language, only what is necessary for understanding the matters with few words.

[A] Or: "And you, trustworthy reader" — While the text directly addresses someone named David, this could be understood as a rhetorical device addressing any faithful reader. This alternative broadens the address to include all readers while maintaining the sense of trustworthiness.

[1] The phrase "לא תחלוניה" is an Aramaic request not to profane or dismiss the work, despite any errors it might contain. Instead, the author humbly asks for instruction and correction.

[2] The phrase "יוד קרת קא חזינא הכא" is an Aramaic expression suggesting someone is putting on urban sophistication or pretentiousness. The author is asking readers not to accuse him of being pretentious in his introduction.

[i] Cf. Zohar — The author implicitly positions his work within the Zoharic tradition by contrasting his adherence to 'words of Torah and rabbinic teachings' (ד״ת ודו״ס) with philosophical approaches. This reflects the Zohar's own stance privileging mystical revelation over rational philosophy. | Cf. Maimonides' Guide for the Perplexed — The author is situating his own work in relation to the rationalist tradition represented by Maimonides. While not rejecting Maimonides outright, he suggests that direct revelation (at Sinai) obviates the need for philosophical proofs of God's existence, unity and simplicity, highlighting his more mystical approach. | Cf. Sefer HaAkedah (Book of the Binding) — This reference shows the author's strategic use of philosophical sources when they support the primacy of revelation over reason, a key principle in kabbalistic thought. He is building a case for the superiority of traditional rabbinic wisdom over philosophical speculation. | Cf. Tana d'bei Eliyahu — This reference establishes divine perfectionism as a model for the author's own careful approach to composition. By drawing this parallel, he suggests that his own writing process, while imperfect, aims to emulate divine thoroughness in preparing sacred texts. | Cf. Proverbs 22:21 — This biblical reference serves as a cornerstone for the author's approach to authorship—positioning himself as a transmitter of divine truth rather than an originator of wisdom, consistent with kabbalistic attitudes toward revelation and tradition.

[ii] The author is addressing an individual named David, whom he describes as "faithful." This could be a specific reader or a generic address to the reader.

will not err with excessive language. It was for this reason that they expelled Rabbi Yirmiyah from the 1455R

[A] Or: "if you wish to give me a fair hearing" — The Hebrew 'tzadkeni' literally means 'justify me' but carries the connotation of giving someone a fair hearing or the benefit of the doubt. This alternative better captures the author's request for a charitable reading.

[1] The Hebrew 'ma'amarot' (discourses) refers to the sections of Ma'avar Yabok. The author is humbly asking the reader to consider reading at least some portions of the book if not the entire work.

[2] This refers to a Talmudic story (Bava Batra 23b) where Rabbi Yirmiyah was temporarily expelled from the study hall for asking excessively technical questions. The author uses this as a cautionary tale about being too verbose or complicated.

[3] The author acknowledges that some passages employ mystical or philosophical interpretations beyond the literal meaning (peshat). This is a typical apologetic stance in kabbalistic works, acknowledging that some content might be challenging while reassuring readers of its overall accessibility.

[4] Translation of the Aramaic legal expression 'mi'uta d'mi'uta,' emphasizing that difficult passages are rare exceptions. The author is reassuring readers that most of the text is accessible to ordinary readers.

[5] This is a reference to Deuteronomy 4:9, which warns against forgetting divine teachings. The author is cautioning against the intellectual arrogance that might lead readers to dismiss teachings they don't immediately understand.

[i] The author acknowledges that there may be some repetition in his work and asks the reader not to be bothered by it.

[ii] The author references a Talmudic story from Bava Batra where Rabbi Yirmiyah was expelled from the study hall for asking overly burdensome questions, using this as a cautionary tale about being excessively verbose.

[iii] The author acknowledges that some passages in his work go beyond the simple literal meaning (peshat) into more mystical or philosophical interpretations, but assures the reader these are relatively few.

[iv] An Aramaic legal term meaning "a minority of a minority"—the author is emphasizing that difficult passages are very rare exceptions in his work.

[v] A reference to Deuteronomy 4:9, warning against forgetting divine teachings. The author is cautioning against intellectual arrogance that leads to disregarding important teachings.

Before I conclude my words, I call upon you, people of distinction, from among my colleagues in charitable societies in every province and all those who join with them to maintain the sacred vigil. Direct your hearts, incline your ears, and let this be as frontlets between your eyes—this counsel drawn from the words of the Talmud and later authorities, both recent and ancient, particularly from the Zohar in many places, especially in the portions of Vayechi, Beshalach, Pekudei, and Ha'azinu. Their utterances clearly instructed all those appointed to keep watch over the sick person[1] who inclines toward death, when the best of physicians says that terrors of illness surround and frighten him, Heaven forbid, and that he is the messenger of the Angel of Death.

If they tell a person, "Your friend is dying," even though he has already confessed as customary on a day close to his appointed time, it is the duty of all who attend to him—his brothers, his acquaintances, and especially members of the burial society—that one distinguished among them should, with sweetness of speech, inform the dying person that this decree comes by the watchers' determination,[B] for [A] Or: "Behold, I have prepared a feast of knowledge—table, bread, and meat—accessible even to students sitting in the basic rows" — This metaphorical expression compares the book to a feast of varying levels of sophistication (table, bread, meat) that is accessible even to beginning students. The alternative makes the metaphorical meaning more explicit while preserving the original imagery.

[B] Or: "by the decree of the celestial guardians" — This alternate translation more explicitly conveys the mystical nature of the 'watchers' (עירין) as celestial beings rather than human observers. The term comes from Daniel 4:14 where it refers specifically to angelic beings who announce divine decrees.

[1] The author is addressing members of the chevra kadisha (burial society) and others who care for the dying, providing specific instructions for their sacred duty.

[i] A metaphorical expression comparing his book to a feast that is accessible even to young students. The table, bread, and meat represent different levels of learning that are available to all readers.

[ii] Cf. Deuteronomy 4:9 — The author uses this biblical reference to caution against intellectual arrogance. Just as the Israelites were warned not to forget what they had seen and learned, the author warns readers not to dismiss teachings they find difficult, suggesting that even challenging mystical passages contain important wisdom that should be retained. | Cf. Talmud Bava Batra — The author references this Talmudic story (Bava Batra 23b) as a self-deprecating cautionary tale. Rabbi Yirmiyah was temporarily expelled for asking questions that were considered too pedantic or burdensome. The author acknowledges the risk of being similarly verbose or technical and promises to avoid this pitfall, showing awareness of the need for clarity and directness in presenting mystical teachings. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok introduction — The author refers to his earlier introduction, showing that this passage comes from a later part of the prefatory material. This self-referential structure was common in rabbinic works, where authors would often include multiple introductory sections addressing different aspects of the work or different audiences. The author seems to be guiding readers to approach the text in a specific order, starting with the general introduction before engaging with the main content.

the Holy One, blessed be He, does nothing without consulting His heavenly court. By the decree of the holy ones, his soul is being summoned to the heavenly academy, and that the day of death is the birth day of his soul[1] and its liberation from imprisonment in the house of darkness. Death is like the darkness before dawn[A] when He seals up the stars and the sun rises upon the earth, and through the power of the small light, the great luminary shines forth—"For the Lord God is a sun and shield." Fortunate is one who surrenders his soul in purity, like drawing a fish from milk[B] when the sun sets and the day is purified. Concerning this, every pious person prays at the proper time—which is death—to fulfill "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul." Evidence comes from Rabbi Akiva, for in this way his soul cleaved and ascended in pure thought to the place of holy anointing oil,[2] and "wisdom preserves the life of its possessor" for eternity. 1495R 1500R 1505R 1510R

Therefore, one should sanctify himself like the seraphim and gather all his thoughts and all the causes and events of his life toward the supernal bed, for its rectification and honor. His soul, as it ascends, will be at the level of attendant unifying the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Divine Presence in light, together with all the bundles of commandments that ascend with it,[3] to its right and left. This will cause rejoicing among the angels of the Divine Presence and the angels of the Holy One, blessed be He, for they will sanctify one another, revere one another, call to one another, and speak with love and brotherhood through the power of this holy soul to which they are bound like a flame bound to a coal: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts," etc. Many songs of light ascend with the holy soul on its upward journey.[C] The heavenly altar is built, and 1515R 1520R 1525R

[A] Or: "Death is the darkness preceding dawn" — This more literal translation of the Aramaic phrase 'קדרינותא דצפרא' preserves the poetic metaphor that compares death to the darkest part of night just before sunrise, emphasizing that spiritual illumination follows the darkness of death.

[B] Or: "like slipping a fish out of milk" — The Aramaic verb 'משחל' conveys a sense of easy extraction or slipping out. This alternative better captures the intended image of a painless, smooth separation of the soul from the body that ideally occurs at death.

[C] Or: "And how many illuminated hymns ascend with the holy soul along its path of eleva-

[1] This positive reframing of death is central to the book's approach, presenting death not as an end but as a spiritual birth or liberation from physical constraints.

[2] A mystical reference to the soul's ascent to the highest divine realms, using the imagery of the sacred anointing oil (שמן משחת קדש) which was used to consecrate priests for divine service.

[3] In Jewish mysticism, the mitzvot (commandments) a person performs create spiritual entities that accompany the soul after death, serving as protective escorts and evidence of merit.

Michael, the great prince, stands and offers the souls of the righteous, as the Tosafot wrote at the end of the second chapter of Menachot, and similar matters known to the reapers of the holy field.[1]

While they still look to him, they should inform him of his Sovereign's decree for his own good and for his soul's benefit, so that his mouth and heart may be aligned in returning through confession in his heart and with his mouth for every sin and transgression, for if not now, when? Above all, he should accept heaven's judgment with love and "God will be with his adversaries," as they said in Tractate Berakhot, chapter 3, concerning one who joins God's name with his suffering, that he is worthy to be a representative of the community,[A] and it is good for him. He should maintain his integrity in any case and not let it go, for anyone who exerts himself in prayer from below has no adversaries from above. Fortunate is one who fulfills a single commandment near his death,[2] for in this he will be called one who serves out of love, and this is the test for every person. Fortunate is one who surrenders his soul with proper intention twice daily to unify His Name through the verse "Hear, O Israel," for then at the time his soul departs, he will have many helpers to unify His great Name.

They should not transgress "You shall not wrong one another," for this is surely a great wronging that consumes from soul to flesh, and they will be dealing with a corpse if they are deceitful in their words. Even though he is distressed now, he will be happy later, and there will be strife between the sick person and those standing around him if they do not act properly. Not like the custom of frivolous women, not like those of Shakhnetziv mentioned in Moed Katan, nor like those spiritually deficient men who say to him, "You will surely live, you will not die," which is like striking him with a hundred lashes with a bundle tion" — This translation better preserves the mystical nuance where 'שירי אורות' refers not just to songs about light but to spiritual emanations or hymns that are themselves illuminated or light-bearing, accompanying the soul in its ascent.

[A] Or: "to be taken as a leader of the assembly" — The Aramaic term 'אדרא' in mystical contexts often refers specifically to a mystical assembly or circle, while 'לאתפוסי' has connotations of being seized or taken up. This translation better captures the mystical context where accepting suffering with faith makes one worthy of spiritual leadership.

[1] מחצדי חקלא קדישא is an Aramaic expression from the Zohar referring to accomplished mystics who 'harvest' spiritual truths, indicating that certain mystical concepts are fully understood only by advanced kabbalists.

[2] The text emphasizes the special merit of performing mitzvot when approaching death, as these are considered done purely for their spiritual value rather than any worldly benefit.

of thorns.[1] And although they said, "Even if a sharp sword rests on a person's neck, he should not hold himself back from mercy," nevertheless, when danger is common, it is different.

Moreover, those who are born are destined to die, and the philosopher says that all that exists will perish. Although our hearts do not imagine it thus, and one cannot learn from generalities because it is specifically sin that causes death and destruction to a person created in the image and likeness of God. We find that the Holy One, blessed be He, sent to inform Hezekiah, "You shall die," only to inform him that "it is time to act for the Lord,"[2] and that one hour of repentance in this world is better than all the life of the World to Come. Great is the power of penitents who in a moment break the depths of Sheol with their repentance. Precious in the eyes of the Lord is the death of His pious ones. One who wishes that his dead not decay should turn him while alive with his face upward. However, after death, they said in the first chapter, page 71, "In the house of Rav they said: One who wishes that his dead not decay should turn him onto his face."[3] There is no conversation more pleasant than this, for the Holy One, blessed be He, does not withhold its reward, as they said in Bava Kamma. 1570R 1575R 1580R 1585R 1590R

[1] This vivid Aramaic metaphor (כמאן דמחו ליה מאה עובלי בעובלי) describes the psychological harm caused by false reassurance, showing that insincerity toward the dying is considered spiritually violent.

[2] This phrase from Psalms 119:126 (עת לעשות לה׳) was often invoked to justify extraordinary measures when circumstances required it. Here it justifies being truthful with the dying to enable proper spiritual preparation.

[3] These seemingly practical instructions about positioning the body have both practical and mystical significance, connected to beliefs about preventing decomposition and facilitating the soul's departure.

[i] Cf. Zohar, Parashat Vayechi — The Zohar in Vayechi explains in mystical terms how one should treat the dying person and prepare their soul for departure. The author cites this as a key source for his guidance. | Cf. Berakhot — This Talmudic reference supports the author's recommendation that the dying person should accept divine judgment with love, citing the merit of one who acknowledges God even in suffering. | Cf. Rabbi Akiva's death narrative — The reference to Rabbi Akiva (abbreviated as ר״ע) points to the famous Talmudic account of his martyrdom, where he recited the Shema while being executed, demonstrating complete love of God even at death. | Cf. Tosafot on Menachot — The author cites this medieval commentary to establish the concept that the angel Michael serves as a heavenly priest offering the souls of the righteous as spiritual sacrifices. | Cf. Ecclesiastes — The author draws on Ecclesiastes' meditation on the inevitability of death, while adding the qualification that death comes specifically from sin, not merely as a natural process.

in the tent at the time of death.[A] Our Sages of blessed memory instructed that all unclean things should be removed[1] from there. Beyond the several reasons associated with the number ten, they are also considered "God's camp," as stated in the Jerusalem Talmud tractate Eruvin: "How many constitute God's camp? Ten, for the Divine Presence dwells among them," as we learned in Pirkei Avot and similarly in Berakhot regarding ten who pray together. As for what is stated in Bava Kamma chapter "Merubah" that the Divine Presence does not rest on fewer than twenty-two thousand, that refers specifically to prophecy. Thus, when ten Israelites are present, the lower camp meets the upper camp,[B] for the spirit of the supernal living beings is in the wheels that correspond to souls on earth,[2] and that place is called "Mahanaim" (dual camps). From these camps, the ascending soul takes angels with it to accompany and protect it from the predatory hawk.[3] Fortunate is one who sanctifies himself in this world. And it states in [A] Or: "One should strive to have a minyan (quorum of ten Jews) present in the room at the moment of passing." — This translation uses the specific Jewish term 'minyan' which is more precise in conveying the religious requirement of ten Jews for certain sacred functions, and uses 'room' instead of 'tent' to avoid confusion since this is not referring to a literal tent in most cases.

[B] Or: "the earthly assembly corresponds to the heavenly host" — This translation more clearly conveys the mystical concept that the human gathering below (ten Jews) creates a parallel to or connection with the angelic gathering above, making the metaphysical meaning more explicit for readers unfamiliar with kabbalistic terminology.

[1] This refers to ritual impurity but also to anything inappropriate that might disturb the sacred atmosphere needed for the soul's transition.

[2] This references the vision of Ezekiel's chariot (Ma'aseh Merkavah), a foundational text for Jewish mysticism. The "wheels" (ofanim) are a category of angels associated with divine movement between realms.

[3] In kabbalistic literature, souls ascending to heaven were thought to be vulnerable to negative spiritual forces, often symbolized as predatory birds. The presence of ten Jews and accompanying angels creates spiritual protection during this transition.

[i] Abbreviation for "ve-amru Rabboteinu Zichronam Livrachah" meaning "our Sages of blessed memory said." This is a common rabbinic formula used when citing teachings from the Talmudic sages.

[ii] Abbreviation for "bi-Yerushalmi de-Eruvin," referring to the Jerusalem Talmud tractate Eruvin.

[iii] "As we learned in Avot" refers to Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers) 3:6, which states that when ten people study Torah together, the Divine Presence dwells among them.

[iv] "And that which we say in Bava Kamma chapter Merubah" refers to a statement in the Babylonian Talmud.

[v] This is an allusion to Genesis 32:1-2, where Jacob encounters angels and names the place Mahanaim (literally "two camps"), symbolizing the meeting of earthly and heavenly realms. The author uses this as a metaphor for the meeting of human and divine presence at the deathbed.

[vi] "From the predatory hawk" refers to negative spiritual forces that might harm the soul during its ascent. This imagery comes from kabbalistic literature where birds of prey often symbolize harmful spiritual entities.

Ra'aya Mehemna, parashat Ki Tetze, regarding the sages' teaching "According to the suffering is the reward,"[A] that when the soul departs, before it leaves it experiences suffering, but after it has departed, it experiences mercy.[1] This is the secret meaning of "With weeping they shall come, and with supplications I will lead them" (Jeremiah 31:8). After this "it is a time of trouble for Jacob, but he shall be saved from it" (Jeremiah 30:7), and they shall depart with mercy. "Better is the day of death than the day of one's birth" (Ecclesiastes 7:1), and "The righteous finds shelter in his death" (Proverbs 14:32). And thus they said, "Behold, it was very good" (Genesis 1:31)—this refers to death, until the

[A] Or: "And in the Zoharic text Ra'aya Mehemna on the Torah portion Ki Tetze, it expounds on the rabbinic principle that "reward is proportionate to the struggle,"" — This translation clarifies that Ra'aya Mehemna is a Zoharic text (part of Kabbalah's primary work) and offers a more accessible rendering of the Aramaic phrase 'leFum tza'ara agra' that better conveys its meaning to modern readers.

[1] This presents a central teaching of Ma'avar Yabok: while the moment of death involves suffering, this is temporary and followed by divine mercy. This provided comfort to the dying and those attending them.

[i] Ra'aya Mehemna (The Faithful Shepherd) is a section of the Zohar, the central text of Jewish mysticism. The reference is to the portion corresponding to the Torah reading of Ki Tetze (Deuteronomy 21:10-25:19).

[ii] This Aramaic phrase means "According to the suffering is the reward" and comes from Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers) 5:23. It expresses the idea that spiritual reward is proportionate to the difficulty overcome.

[iii] This is a quotation from Jeremiah 31:8, "With weeping they shall come, and with supplications I will lead them." In context, it refers to the exile and redemption of Israel, but here it is applied to the soul's journey after death.

[iv] This is a quotation from Jeremiah 30:7, "It is a time of trouble for Jacob, but he shall be saved from it." Like the previous quote, it is reinterpreted here to refer to the soul's journey through difficulty to salvation after death.

[v] The Tree of Life is a central kabbalistic symbol representing divine creative energy flowing into creation. In eschatological contexts, it also refers to the immortality that will be restored in the messianic era.

[vi] Cf. Jerusalem Talmud Eruvin — This text is referenced to provide a rabbinic basis for having ten people present at death, suggesting that this creates a sacred space for the soul's transition. | Cf. Pirkei Avot — This reference reinforces the importance of a minyan (quorum of ten) as creating a sacred space where the Divine Presence dwells, making it appropriate for the soul's transition. | Cf. Tractate Berakhot — This reference connects prayer with the presence of ten people, suggesting that the minyan at death facilitates prayers that assist the soul's transition. | Cf. Bava Kamma — This reference is used to distinguish between the requirements for prophecy (22,000 people) versus the Divine Presence in ordinary circumstances (ten people), clarifying why ten suffices at a deathbed. | Cf. Zohar, Ra'aya Mehemna — This kabbalistic text is cited to reveal the mystical understanding of death as a transition from suffering to mercy, providing comfort about the ultimate fate of the departing soul. | Cf. Genesis 32:1-2 — This biblical allusion suggests that just as Jacob encountered angels at Mahanaim, the dying person encounters both earthly and heavenly beings at death, with ten people representing the earthly camp meeting the heavenly one. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 7:1 — This verse is cited to present death in a positive light, as the completion of life's purpose rather than merely its end, offering comfort to both the dying and those attending them.

It is written in Orchot Chaim: "My son, be diligent in visiting the sick, for the visitor eases the ill person's suffering.[2] Encourage them to return to their Creator, pray for them, and then leave—do not burden them with a lengthy stay, for they have enough to bear with the weight of their illness. When you enter to see a sick person, approach them with joy and a good heart, and speak to them cheerfully, for their eyes and heart depend upon those who come to visit them."[3]

The day of salvation shall surely come with joy,[4] for then death will be swallowed up forever, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces, together with all His people Israel who are redeemed. The mountain of the Lord's house shall be established at the top of the mountains, with the help of the One who illuminates the earth and its inhabitants. The holy spirit will rest upon us, and we will recite many songs before Him. He will kiss me with the kisses

[1] This refers to the messianic era or World to Come, when death will be overcome and immortality restored through access to the Tree of Life, which was withheld after Adam and Eve's expulsion from Eden.

[2] The Hebrew 'מיקל חליו עליו' literally means 'lightens his illness upon him,' reflecting the Jewish understanding that proper visitation can have a tangible effect on alleviating suffering.

[3] This beautiful expression captures the psychological and emotional impact of visitation—the sick person's hopes, spirits, and emotional wellbeing are significantly affected by how visitors approach them.

[4] The Hebrew uses a grammatical doubling ('בא יבא') for emphasis, which I've rendered as 'shall surely come.'

[i] Orchot Chaim (Paths of Life) is a halakhic work composed by Rabbi Aharon HaKohen of Lunel in the 14th century. It contains laws and ethical teachings organized around daily life and ritual observance.

[ii] This highlights that visiting the sick in Jewish tradition involves spiritual care alongside physical comfort—encouraging repentance and reconnection with God is considered an essential part of the visitation.

[iii] This opening combines Isaiah 35:10 ('they shall come with singing') with other biblical phrases to describe the day of redemption when death will be defeated.

[iv] This phrase is drawn from Isaiah 25:8: 'He will swallow up death forever,' referring to the ultimate elimination of death in the messianic era.

[v] A direct quote from Isaiah 25:8: 'The Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces,' describing divine comfort in the messianic age.

[vi] This comes from Isaiah 2:2 and Micah 4:1, describing the elevation of the Temple Mount in messianic times.

Let the name of the dignified, exalted, and highly elevated leader, the insightful and discerning Rabbi Matzliach Menachem son of Rabbi Mattathias Puah of blessed memory, be remembered for good. His aforementioned father was my beloved friend, dear as my own soul, for together we were bound as one, pouring water [studying] under the guidance of the pious and holy[B] master Rabbi Hillel of Modena, may the memory of the holy righteous one be a blessing. His heart was like a lion's heart in all knowledge. He merited a good offspring, a plant of the Lord for glory, who from his roots has flourished and multiplied—namely the aforementioned dignitary, his son, who provided me support and sanctified me with a loan to print this book. I hereby take a blessing for this man of valor with many accomplishments, for his righteousness has sustained me.[2] Though mine is but a simple blessing of an ordinary person and not like a resounding voice of-

[A] Or: "And He will kiss me with the kisses with which He kissed His children" — This alternate translation is more literal and preserves the relative clause structure of the Hebrew original. It's slightly less smooth in English but more precisely matches the Hebrew syntax.

[B] Or: "we poured water [a metaphor for serving/studying with] under the guidance of the pious and holy" — The metaphor of 'pouring water' in rabbinic contexts often refers to serving a master or studying under their guidance. This alternate makes the service relationship more explicit.

[1] These terms ('יחוד עליון' and 'יחוד התחתון') are technical kabbalistic concepts referring to the unification of divine attributes in the upper and lower spiritual worlds. In Kabbalistic thought, the messianic redemption will bring complete harmony between all levels of reality.

[2] The author employs wordplay here, as the Hebrew term for 'sustain' (סמכתני) relates to the earlier description of the patron providing 'support' (סמוכות).

[i] This adapts language from Song of Songs 1:2 ('Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth') but modifies it to speak of God kissing His children, referring to the intimate divine connection in the messianic age.

[ii] This adapts Zechariah 14:9 ('on that day the Lord will be one and His name one') but adds kabbalistic terminology about upper and lower unifications, referring to the complete harmony between different aspects of divinity in the messianic era.

[iii] Cf. Isaiah 25:8 — This verse from Isaiah is used as a foundational text for the Jewish conception of the messianic era, when death will be eliminated. The author invokes this prophecy to describe the ultimate hope that contextualizes the book's teachings about death—while death is currently a reality requiring proper ritual attention, it will eventually be overcome. | Cf. Zechariah 14:9 — The author alludes to this verse about divine unity in messianic times by adding kabbalistic terminology about 'upper' and 'lower' unifications. This transforms the biblical prophecy into a mystical meditation on how the messianic era will bring harmony between different aspects of the divine presence across all spiritual worlds. | Cf. Song of Songs 1:2 — The author alludes to this verse from Song of Songs, which is traditionally interpreted as expressing Israel's desire for intimate connection with God. By modifying it to refer to God kissing 'His children,' the text emphasizes the parent-child relationship between God and Israel that will be fully restored in messianic times.

[A] Or: "And for a priceless pearl, whatever praise you give it only diminishes its value" — This Aramaic expression is somewhat difficult to translate elegantly. This alternate provides a slightly more direct rendering while preserving the meaning that excessive praise can actually diminish the value of something truly precious.

[B] Or: "his relative and servant, the thread that binds, ABMI" — The phrase 'חיתא דקטרי' is challenging. It may refer to someone who connects or binds things together, possibly in a metaphorical sense as a mediator or one who maintains relationships. This alternate offers a more poetic rendering.

[1] The Aramaic phrase 'גולתא דדהבא ודכספא' (crown of gold and silver) metaphorically refers to wealth and prosperity that God has bestowed upon the patron.

[1] This is an allusion to Song of Songs 8:6, 'Place me as a seal upon your heart, as a seal upon your arm,' which in Jewish mystical tradition symbolizes the intimate connection between God and the Jewish people.
[2] This refers to the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the Temple, a central messianic hope in Jewish tradition.
[3] The Hebrew "פתח פתחתי" uses a doubled verb form that creates emphasis and poetic rhythm that is difficult to capture in English. It literally means "I have opened an opening."
[4] The Hebrew uses the idiom "ירוץ קורא" (the reader will run) which suggests both speed and ease of navigation through the text.

[i] Cf. Zohar — The author is using this imagery to request that God maintain a close spiritual bond with him, protecting him and marking him as belonging to the divine service. | Cf. Isaiah 30:26 — The author is expressing hope for messianic redemption, when spiritual illumination will be greatly magnified and the current limitations of our understanding will be removed. | Cf. Psalms 73:24 — The author is praying for divine guidance and physical/spiritual strengthening, connecting his individual request to biblical promises of divine sustenance for the righteous.
[ii] The title "Ma'avar Yabok" (Crossing of the Yabok) refers to Jacob's biblical crossing of the Yabok River (Genesis 32), which is used as a metaphor for the soul's transition from this world to the next—the central theme of this book on death and dying.

A prayer to the living God who gives and will give again strength, salvation, wisdom, and knowledge.[4] We have eternal salvation in the house of the King of the Universe; therefore, "behold, it was very good"—this is the intellect that on that day becomes the birthplace of souls. The order of governance by the Eternal Rock of the Worlds with humanity is through slumbers upon the bed in dreams. The interpretation of dreams that speak falsehood. In what context do we say "dream matters neither elevate nor lower"? How sufferings come upon a person in gradual stages: first minor discomforts, then mild fever, then burning of the bones, then other illnesses[5]—and he proves all this from verses of Elihu. [1] The Hebrew "שיחן" is a poetic term for discourse or conversation that has connotations of both formal teaching and intimate dialogue.
[2] The Hebrew "ציוני" literally means "signs" or "markers" and refers to the organizational elements that help navigate the text.
[3] This concluding phrase expresses the author's hope that his work, despite its modest scope, will have spiritual benefit for both himself and his readers. It reflects the common rabbinic belief that one's teachings perpetuate one's spiritual legacy.
[4] This opening prayer establishes the text's theological framework, viewing God as the source of both physical and spiritual sustenance, particularly relevant for a work focused on illness and death.
[5] The author presents a progressive model of illness as divine communication, each stage serving as a stronger warning if previous signals were ignored. This perspective frames illness not as random misfortune but as purposeful divine intervention.

[i] This alludes to Habakkuk 2:2, "Write the vision and make it plain upon tablets, that he who reads it may run." The author is suggesting that his organization of the material will allow readers to move quickly through the text and find what they need.
[ii] An abbreviation for "על כן" (therefore/for this reason).
[iii] The author uses architectural terminology (chambers and halls) as a metaphor for the structure and organization of his book, drawing on biblical language used to describe the Temple.
[iv] This phrase combines biblical allusions. "מצער" (few/small) appears in contexts of humility, while "תחי נפשי" (may my soul live) echoes Genesis 19:20 where Lot requests to flee to a small city. The author is expressing hope that even his modest contribution will have spiritual value.
[v] This phrase draws on the imagery of the Temple as God's dwelling place, suggesting that eternal salvation comes from connection to divine presence.
[vi] This is a kabbalistic concept connecting the brain/intellect (moach) with spiritual birth or renewal of souls.
[vii] The text presents a progressive model of illness as divine communication: first minor discomforts, then mild fever, then bone-burning fever, and finally other critical illnesses.

as we explained at the beginning of this discourse.
A person should be careful in his actions not to for the healing of the body. However, he should 45R focus primarily on healing the soul, and blessed is one who considers the poor. There are appointed beings in the holy chambers who reward those who is it called "visiting the sick" (bikur cholim)? Some 50R things appropriate to mention to the sick person, and above all, to teach him to understand that through suffering he fulfills "For Your sake we are Through sufferings, the power of holy judgments is [A] Or: "not to harm his spiritual destiny" — The concept of 'mazal' in kabbalistic contexts often refers to spiritual destiny or celestial connection rather than just fortune. This translation better captures the mystical dimension.

[B] Or: "when the soul reaches its lowest point" — While 'crushing' is literal, this alternative conveys the metaphorical meaning in more accessible English while preserving the notion of spiritual nadir.

[C] Or: "the foolish Angel of Death consumes his flesh" — The acronym ס״מ (Samael) refers to the Angel of Death in Jewish mystical tradition. The alternate translation provides clarity for readers unfamiliar with this reference.

[i] This refers to a passage in the Zohar (the central text of Jewish mysticism) that discusses how the soul begins to withdraw from a severely ill person who cannot pray.

[ii] This references Psalms 44:23, where suffering is portrayed as a form of sacrifice. The author suggests that patients should view their suffering as service to God.

sweetened,[1] and the body of the righteous is offered as a sacrifice to God. The interpretation of "Those who hope in the Lord will renew their strength." Why the Torah is called "wisdom." The source of nourishment for Torah scholars and how they benefit from the hidden holiness in bread, meat, and wine. Every righteous person has his own dwelling place, and it goes without saying that the rod of the wicked will not rest upon the lot of the righteous. The words of repentance of a deathly ill person are considered as if written and delivered above; therefore, it is good to set a table before every God-fearing person who trembles for his soul, with bread, meat, and wine,[1] especially for those who do not study Mishnah, laws, Sifra, or Sifrei, as long as human deeds in matters of commandments do not cause division below or create pleasure above. One who hears from the least in Israel is like one who hears from Moses our teacher,[2] peace be upon him, and even from the Holy One, blessed be He, as it were. A great person should not be ashamed to learn from a lesser one. Some of the general principles and discourses that appear in the first three discourses. Three arrangements of verses: the first to accustom a person to recite them daily, evening and morning; the second specifically for the sick person in his discomfort and illness to entreat God with them for healing; the third for one who is greatly oppressed by the world. There is nothing superior to the arrangement of verses

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic concept of 'sweetening judgments' (המתקת הדינים), where divine severity is transformed into mercy through proper spiritual processes. Suffering is thus viewed as spiritually productive.

[2] The author suggests providing physical nourishment alongside spiritual guidance, showing a holistic approach to caring for the ill and dying that addresses both body and soul.

[3] This statement reflects the author's view that divine wisdom can come through any person regardless of status, encouraging readers to be receptive to spiritual guidance from all sources, particularly relevant in end-of-life contexts.

[4] The book's title references Jacob's crossing of the Yabok River (Genesis 32), which preceded his transformative wrestling with an angel. This serves as a metaphor for the soul's transition from life to death.

[i] ס״מ (Samael) is a kabbalistic name for the Angel of Death. The text uses the metaphor of the Evil Inclination consuming one's flesh during illness.

in prayer. The explanation of those who engage in Scripture as "a measure that is not a measure." Run, O righteous members of charitable societies in every city, to do the will of your Master, and before you shall be a memorial of some of these words of the sages. Here is presented a collection of devotional intentions and holy matters to be recited before the sick person until his Shulamite soul returns to the cities of the chariots, and nobles will come to greet it. They should strengthen him with their words in the faith of our Torah and in the other thirteen principles of faith, especially the unity in "Hear, O Israel," etc. Groups of righteous ones who sit in the Garden of Eden beneath the Tree of Life, on the verse "There are sixty queens," etc. Why they said that the Torah a person learns in this world is vanity compared to the Torah in the World to Come. Why discourses are called "pools." The impression and reward for one who brings forth words of Torah in public. The reward reserved for members of charitable societies and for every individual in Israel who strives to bring a Jewish soul with love, affection, and will before the Lord. There is an appointee to the south in the third chamber of holiness who engraves the image of one who performs this kindness, and the words of Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai in Parshat Pekudei. Those who interpret the words of the righteous who rest in peace in this world will merit that they will come out to greet them at the time of their death. Great reward from our Sages' words for acts of kindness. We are commanded and encouraged by our Sages' words in the Talmud and in the book of the Zohar that anyone who stands by a sick person and sees that he is inclined to die, God forbid, is obligated to inform hi[1]m that it is by the decree of the watchers and that he is being sought in the heavenly academy, and therefore it is time for him to act for the Lord, as one can acquire his world in a single hour. This is unlike the practice of those of base spirit who transgress in this matter the prohibition of "You shall not wrong one another." We find regarding Rav Papa, when he went to visit Rav Huna, the son of Rav Yehoshua, in Tractate Rosh Hashanah, first chapter, that he said, "Prepare provisions for him," and informed the sick person of this. The proof is that afterward he was embarrassed before him, but Rav Huna said to him that this was indeed the case, etc. It is good for ten men to be present at the time of the soul's departure,[A] and the reason for this: The initial departure of the soul, as it begins to leave, is painful for it. However, after it has departed, it is with mercy,[1] and this is the meaning of "With weeping they will come, and with supplications I will lead them." The order of visiting the sick from Orchot Chaim. A request and supplication from the author to our merciful God that He may help him for the sake of the honor of His name, with all Israel as companions, Amen, so may it be His will.

[A] Or: "It is good for a minyan (quorum of ten Jews) to be present at the time of the soul's departure" — Including the term 'minyan' adds cultural context about the significance of having ten Jewish men present, which is an important concept in Jewish religious practice.

[1] This consoling teaching from Jewish mysticism suggests that while the transition of death is initially difficult, the soul experiences divine mercy after complete separation from the body.

[i] This Aramaic passage explains that while the soul experiences pain during its initial departure, after it fully leaves the body it experiences divine mercy.

[ii] This quotes Jeremiah 31:8, applied here to souls arriving in the afterlife with weeping but then being led with compassion.

[iii] Cf. Zohar, Parshat Vayechi — The author cites this Zohar passage to establish a kabbalistic framework for understanding the soul's gradual departure during serious illness. | Cf. Job 33 — The author uses Elihu's speech in Job as a biblical source for the concept that illness progresses in stages, each serving as a divine warning. | Cf. Zohar, Parshat Beshalach — The author uses this Zoharic teaching to establish that while physical healing is important, spiritual healing should be the primary focus when visiting the sick. | Cf. Zohar, Ra'aya Mehemna — The author cites this mystical teaching to comfort readers with the knowledge that while the soul's departure is painful, it experiences divine mercy afterward. | Cf. Psalms 44:23 — This biblical verse is presented as a meditation for the sick person to view their suffering as a form of sacrifice and service to God. | Cf. Song of Songs 6:13 — The author uses this poetic biblical image to represent the soul's return to heavenly realms after death, providing a comforting metaphor for the transition. | Cf. Rosh Hashanah 22a — This Talmudic story is cited to prove that one should honestly inform the dying of their condition, rather than hide the truth from them. | Cf. Jeremiah 31:8 — This verse is applied to the soul's journey after death, suggesting that while departure is painful, God leads souls with mercy and compassion.

Discourses on sickness and death

שפתי צדק / Lips of Righteousness

פרק א׳ — Chapter 1

מאמר א׳ מספר מעב״ר יב״ק[i] — The First Discourse from the Book Ma'avar Yabok

יהא רעוא.[ii] דאימא מלתא.[iii] דתתקבל ברעוא.[iv] קדם מלכא רמא.[v] וקדם צדקיא:[vi][vii] — May it be Your will[1] that I may speak words that will be received favorably before the exalted King[2] and before the righteous ones.[3]

אל ה׳ ויאר לנו וקדשנו במצותיו וצונו בהם לטוב לנו כל הימים ובהם יש בכחם יתר שאת ויתר עז בקצתם כי הקרן קיימת להם — To the Lord who illuminates us, sanctifies us with His commandments, and instructs us through them for our benefit all our days. These commandments possess greater strength and power, for their principal 5R

[1] The original doesn't specifically say "Your" but this is implied in the Aramaic phrase, which is a standard opening formula in Jewish prayer addressing God.
[2] This is a reference to God, using royal imagery that is common in Jewish liturgy.
[3] This may refer to righteous people in general, deceased righteous sages whose merit the author invokes, or the rabbinic authorities whose teachings he is drawing upon in this work.

[i] The title literally means "First Discourse from the Book Ma'avar Yabok". The word מאמר (ma'amar) refers to a discourse or treatise, while מעב״ר יב״ק (Ma'avar Yabok) refers to the "Crossing of the Yabok", a metaphorical reference to the biblical Jacob's crossing of the Yabok River before his transformative encounter with an angel. In this context, it symbolizes the soul's transition from life to death. The acronym יב״ק (YBK) equals 112 in gematria (Hebrew numerology), which the author will later connect to specific verses that aid the soul's transition.
[ii] This is an Aramaic phrase meaning "May it be [God's] will." It's a common opening formula in Jewish liturgical texts, particularly in Kabbalistic works.
[iii] Aramaic for "that I may speak words" or "that I may say something."
[iv] Aramaic phrase meaning "that will be received with favor/willingly."
[v] Aramaic for "before the exalted King," a reference to God.
[vi] Aramaic for "and before the righteous ones," which could refer to righteous people generally or specifically to the righteous sages whose teachings the author draws upon.
[vii] Cf. Zohar — This opening prayer resembles the introductory formula used in many sections of the Zohar, where discourses often begin with an Aramaic invocation seeking divine favor for the teachings about to be presented.

reward remains for the World to Come, while their fruits are enjoyed by humans in the world of souls 10R called This World.[1] The meaning of 'principal' and 'fruits' is that the principal is the divine flow that descends upon Malkhut (Divine Presence) through the mystery of reflected light and direct light at the time of performing that commandment, as will be ex- 15R plained later. Afterward, that light produces fruits, like seeds of the earth that grow, yield fruits, are sown again, and continue to yield fruits. Similarly, that holy light is sown in the supernal earth,[2] where it grows plants and fruits. 20R

Among these commandments is gemilut chasadim (acts of loving-kindness), meaning the channeling of kindness from its source, including the kindness within the attribute of Gevurah[3] (Strength). Thus, they are called 25R
'chasadim' in plural form. When a person performs kindness toward others, they channel influence from the side of Chesed (Kindness), and if they perform these acts with their strength and might, they channel from the kindness within Gevurah—this 30R is gemilut chasadim. This commandment applies to both the living and the dead, and involves both one's body and wealth. It is equivalent to the merit of the Patriarchs.[4] We say in Vayikra Rabbah,

[1]The author makes the somewhat counterintuitive statement that our physical world is actually "the world of souls," emphasizing that what appears material is in fact deeply spiritual from a mystical perspective.

[2]The text employs agricultural metaphors to describe spiritual processes, comparing divine light to seeds that produce ongoing spiritual harvests. This agricultural imagery is common in kabbalistic texts to explain how human actions generate cosmic effects.

[3]This reflects the kabbalistic concept of interinclusion (הכללות), where each divine attribute contains elements of the others. Though Gevurah primarily represents judgment and restriction, it contains an aspect of kindness that can be activated through human actions.

[4]This powerful statement elevates acts of kindness to the highest possible status, suggesting that [i]This passage uses the rabbinic concept of 'principal and fruits' (קרן ופירות) to explain the metaphysical rewards of performing mitzvot. The 'principal' (קרן) represents the eternal reward preserved for the World to Come, while the 'fruits' (פירות) are benefits enjoyed in this world.

[ii]The kabbalistic terms 'or chozer' (reflected light) and 'or yashar' (direct light) describe the reciprocal flow of divine energy. Direct light descends from God to creation, while reflected light returns upward from human actions back to the divine realm.

[iii]The 'supernal earth' (ארץ העליונה) refers to the divine attribute of Malkhut (Kingdom/Divine Presence), often symbolized as earth or soil in kabbalistic literature. The metaphor of sowing light as seeds indicates how human actions generate ongoing spiritual effects.

[iv]Gemilut chasadim (acts of loving-kindness) is considered one of the pillars of Jewish ethics, encompassing charity, visiting the sick, burying the dead, and other selfless actions. The text explains its kabbalistic dimension as channeling divine attributes.

chapter 36, regarding the verse “For the mountains may depart and the hills be removed”—if you see that the merit of the Patriarchs is declining[1] and the merit of the Matriarchs is faltering, go and engage in acts of kindness. See also the Jerusalem Talmud, Sotah, first chapter, regarding the greatness of the commandment of gemilut chasadim, as well as in our Talmud there, in Bava Metzia, and in Shabbat, chapter “Mefanin.” 35R 40R

Visiting the sick (bikur cholim) is also a commandment that has both principal and fruits, and we will explain its secret later. It is stated in the chapter “Ein Bein HaMudar” and in the Jerusalem Talmud of Pe’ah that visiting the sick is an obligation upon everyone,[2] and in the aforementioned chapter, the proper times for visitation are explained. Our Sages further stated in Sotah that the Holy One, blessed be He, visits the sick[3] and buries the dead. In the first chapter of Shabbat, it is written that whoever visits the sick must pray for mercy on their behalf with a pained heart, and visitation without praying for mercy does not fulfill the commandment.[4] The elder rabbis of the Mishnah and Baraita sweetened their words by explaining that one should include the sick person among all the sick of Israel. And even though according to some opinions there is no suffering without sin, nevertheless, a decree against 45R 50R 55R 60R ordinary people can achieve spiritual merit comparable to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob through compassionate actions.

[1] This reflects the rabbinic concept that the protective merit of the ancestors might diminish over time, requiring each generation to establish its own spiritual achievements through acts of kindness.

[2] Unlike some commandments that apply only to certain individuals or in specific circumstances, bikur cholim (visiting the sick) is presented as a universal obligation, highlighting its fundamental importance in Jewish ethics.

[3] This anthropomorphic description of God performing human mitzvot serves as the ultimate model for human behavior, suggesting that when humans visit the sick, they are imitating divine actions.

[4] This emphasizes that the mitzvah requires both physical presence and spiritual intervention through prayer, establishing that proper bikur cholim has both material and metaphysical dimensions.

[i] The Mishnah in Peah 1:1 lists deeds whose ‘fruits’ (partial reward) one enjoys in this world while the ‘principal’ (full reward) remains for the World to Come. These include honoring parents, acts of kindness, and making peace between people. The text here adds visiting the sick to this category.

[ii] This reflects the Talmudic teaching (Shabbat 12b) that prayer is an essential component of visiting the sick. Without praying for the sick person’s recovery, the visit does not fulfill the mitzvah completely.

[iii] This refers to the rabbinic practice of praying for an individual within the context of all who are suffering from similar conditions. This has both theological significance (connecting the individual to the community) and practical benefit (since prayers for the community are considered more powerful).

[iv] This is a reference to the Talmudic teaching (Rosh Hashanah 18a) that crying out in prayer is effective even before a divine decree is sealed, and in some cases, even after.

many can be torn up,[1] unlike a decree against an individual—aside from the fact that crying out is beneficial for a person even before a decree is issued, etc. 65R

On the Sabbath day, when the light of the Ancient One is revealed and abundant mercy spreads throughout the world through the power of the seven levels of the Throne,[2] which is the World of Creation (Beriah) encompassed by the 70R name Achtariel Yah YHVH Tzeva'ot, within which the holy emanation (Atzilut) clothes itself in seven palaces, as their names are explained in the Tikkunim (mystical works), alluded to in the seven letters AHYH YHV, and they have seven 75R names HVYH, ALYHVD with vowel points chirik-segol-chirik, ALHYM, HVYH, HVYH, ADNY, as explained in the commandments of Devarim, commandment 24—on that holy day, it is all the more necessary to pray for the sick in plural form 80R because it is considered a communal need,[3] which one is permitted to request on Shabbat. However, it is forbidden to cry out for the sick on Shabbat, as they said, "Shabbat prohibits crying out," for crying out is greater than the ten expressions of 85R prayer.[4] It refers to when a person prays until their tongue falls short and they cry out from heart pain, for this happens at the gathering place of thought, alluded to by "Crown of All" (Keter). The ultimate

[1] This reflects the rabbinic concept that collective prayer has greater spiritual power than individual prayer, explaining why including the individual in the community's suffering increases the efficacy of prayers for healing.

[2] This refers to the kabbalistic understanding of the divine throne mentioned in Ezekiel's vision, with its seven levels corresponding to lower divine emanations that transmit divine influence to creation.

[3] This provides a halakhic (legal) justification for praying for the sick on Shabbat, as normally personal requests are limited on Shabbat, but communal needs may be addressed.

[4] Rabbinic tradition identifies ten terms for prayer in scripture (including 'cry,' 'plea,' 'supplication,' etc.). The text elevates emotional crying-out above all other forms of prayer for its spiritual potency.

[i] This Aramaic phrase translates as 'On Sabbath when the light of the Ancient One is revealed.' In Kabbalah, Shabbat is considered a time when higher divine attributes (particularly those associated with mercy) are more accessible than during weekdays.

[ii] Achtariel Yah YHVH Tzeva'ot is a divine name appearing in the Talmud (Berakhot 7a), associated with God as seen in a vision by Rabbi Ishmael in the Holy of Holies. The name combines 'keter' (crown) with 'El' (God) and other divine names.

[iii] This is from the formula recited on Shabbat for the sick: 'Shabbat prohibits crying out, but healing will soon come.' The text explains why intense emotional prayer (ze'akah/crying out) is inappropriate on Shabbat, when divine mercy is already more accessible.

[iv] The Hebrew abbreviation כ״ע stands for 'Keter Elyon' (Supreme Crown), the highest of the ten sefirot (divine emanations) in Kabbalah, representing God's infinite will and the source of all divine emanation.

90R purpose of prayer is that the cry should rise from the heart. Therefore, they said that it tears up a person's decree all their days.[1] They also said: Great is crying out, for it rules over the attribute of Judgment above. Furthermore, great is crying out, 95R for it rules in this world and in the World to Come. Additionally, through it, one inherits this world and the World to Come, for it nullifies even the severe attribute of Judgment.[2] The judgments of Binah (Understanding) are sweetened through it, and it 100R causes the Mother to return to the children.[3] It has many special qualities, as the power of its awakening reaches the Crown of All. Therefore, one should not cry out from heart pain for the sick on Shabbat. However, on weekdays, it is an obligation to feel the 105R pain of the sick person and pray for them until one reaches the point of crying out. Through this, one will merit to behold the pleasantness of the Lord, which is Binah, and to visit His palace, which is Malkhut—behold, his reward is with him in this 110R world and in the World to Come, the secret of Binah and Malkhut.

It is written in Midrash Rabbah that even if one is not an age-mate of the sick person[4] who visits them, nevertheless, it benefits them. In the chapter "Ein Bein HaMudar," Reish Lakish said: From 115R where in the Torah do we find a hint to visiting the sick? From the verse "If these men die the common

[1] This emphasizes the extraordinary power attributed to heartfelt, emotional prayer to overturn even divine judgments that have been issued against a person.

[2] In kabbalistic thought, crying out in prayer has the power to transform harsh divine judgment (din) into mercy (rachamim), a process known as 'sweetening the judgments' (המתקת הדינים).

[3] This kabbalistic metaphor describes how the divine attribute of Binah (Understanding, the 'Mother') influences the lower sefirot (the 'children'), creating a flow of mercy and blessing in response to heartfelt prayer.

[4] The text addresses the folk belief that those of similar age to the patient have special healing influence, clarifying that while age-mates may have greater impact, anyone's visitation provides benefit.

[i] This kabbalistic expression refers to the divine attribute of Binah (Understanding, the 'Mother') turning toward and influencing the lower sefirot (the 'children'). It signifies a flow of divine mercy from higher to lower spiritual realms.

[ii] This interprets Psalm 27:4 ('to behold the pleasantness of the Lord and to visit His temple') as referring to experiencing the divine attributes of Binah (Understanding) and Malkhut (Kingdom), representing connection to higher spiritual realms.

[iii] This verse (Numbers 16:29) from Korah's rebellion is interpreted creatively in the Talmud (Nedarim 39b-40a) as a reference to visiting the sick. The word 'פקודת' (visitation/appointment) is understood as referring to others visiting them in their illness.

[iv] The tradition that visitors take away 1/60th of a sick person's illness appears in various rabbinic sources. The text offers a numerical interpretation based on the gematria (numerical value) of the Hebrew word for 'bed' (המטה = 59) to explain why the precise amount is 59/60 rather than exactly 1/60.

death of all men, or if they be visited according to the visitation of all men." I have heard that they connect the taking of sixty parts of the illness by one who is the sick person's age-mate to the verse "And Israel strengthened himself and sat upon the bed." The word "bed" (HaMiTaH) in gematria equals 59, for when Joseph came—who was certainly his father's age-mate, as his facial features resembled his,[1] and moreover, everything that happened to Jacob happened to Joseph[2]—besides that, his chariot was the chariot of the viceroy which he had, whenever he came to visit his father, then Israel strengthened himself from his illness and sat up, relieved of 59 parts of it, according to the gematria of "HaMiTaH" (the bed).[3] This is more precise than saying that "sixty" is not exact, but rather it is common in the language of the rabbis to say "sixty vessels arrived" or "sixty runners ran" and the like.

סדר בקשת רחמים בשהולך

The procedure for requesting mercy when visiting

[1]The midrashic tradition that Joseph physically resembled Jacob serves to strengthen the mystical connection between them that enabled Joseph's visit to have particular healing power.

[2]This reflects the rabbinic principle that Joseph's life paralleled his father's in many ways, establishing a spiritual resonance between them that enhanced Joseph's ability to heal Jacob through his presence.

[3]The author uses gematria (Hebrew numerology) to explain the precise amount of healing (59/60ths) that occurs when an age-mate visits the sick, connecting the value of 'the bed' (המטה = 59) to the traditional teaching about healing.

[i]The phrase 'ziv ikonin' (facial features or countenance) refers to the midrashic tradition that Joseph physically resembled his father Jacob. The Greek-derived term 'ikonin' (from 'icon' or 'image') is used in rabbinic literature to describe facial appearance.

[ii]This Aramaic phrase means 'it is common in the mouths of the rabbis' or 'it is a common saying among the sages.' The author explains that the number sixty is used as a conventional round number in many rabbinic expressions.

Mishnah Peah 1:1 — The author draws on this foundational Mishnah to categorize visiting the sick among the highest religious obligations that generate both immediate and eternal spiritual rewards. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Shabbat 12b — The author incorporates this Talmudic teaching to establish that prayer is an essential component of properly visiting the sick, without which the mitzvah is not fulfilled. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Nedarim 39b-40a — The author cites this creative Talmudic interpretation to demonstrate that visiting the sick, while not explicitly commanded in the Torah, has implicit biblical support. | Cf. Zohar, Pekudei — The author draws on Zoharic cosmology to explain how divine mercy flows through the spiritual worlds on Shabbat, making it a particularly appropriate time for healing. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Rosh Hashanah 18a — The author incorporates this teaching to emphasize the extraordinary power of emotional prayer to overturn divine judgments, even those that appear to be finalized. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Berakhot 7a — The author references this Talmudic account to connect the divine name mentioned with the spiritual forces active on Shabbat that facilitate healing. | Cf. the sick.[1] It seems appropriate to recite over the patient the verse: "No evil shall befall you, nor shall any plague come near your dwelling" (Psalm 91:10). For "evil" refers to Lilith,[2] that she should not befall him, and likewise "plague," which originates from the head of Samael, should not approach his tent. In the Zohar, Parshat Shelach page 65, it calls her "evil sickness," and from them arise all kinds of afflictions, diseases, and the outcomes of death. One should add: "For He shall give His angels charge over you" (Psalm 91:11)—these are the angels of the Holy One, blessed be He. "He shall give His angels charge over you" literally means that He assigns them to you to guard you through these angels. And when they are with a person, the Divine Presence is found explicitly with him "to keep you in all your ways" (Psalm 91:11)—where "ways" symbolize the paths from Malkhut to Tiferet and from Tiferet to Malkhut through the foundation called "Kol" (All).[3]

One should also focus on the powers that flow from the Supernal King for the healing of all flesh, which are appointed in the upper chambers. Additionally, when saying "For He shall give His angels charge over you," one should contemplate the channels of light appointed to guard the soul's departure so it will not suffer upon leaving, if, God forbid, death has been decreed upon the person (may we be spared).[4] It is written in Saba (Zohar) page 98b that the Holy One, blessed be He, walks upon the wings of the wind to bring healing to the world. This is Raphael, who receives influence from Malkhut, which [1]This section outlines a specific kabbalistic ritual to be performed when visiting ill people, combining biblical verses with mystical meditations to promote healing.

[2]In Jewish mysticism, illness was often attributed to demonic forces, with Lilith (Adam's legendary first wife who became a demoness) specifically associated with disease and death.

[3]This describes the kabbalistic structure of divine emanations (sefirot), where Yesod (Foundation) serves as the channel connecting Tiferet (masculine aspect) with Malkhut (feminine aspect), facilitating the flow of divine energy.

[4]The Hebrew phrase 'bar minan' (may we be spared) is a traditional apotropaic formula used when mentioning death or misfortune, intended to ward off the possibility of such events affecting the speaker or listeners.

[i]This is Psalm 91:10, which the author interprets kabbalistically as protection against demonic forces.

[ii]The author identifies 'evil' (ra'ah) with Lilith, the female demonic figure in Jewish mysticism associated with disease and infant mortality.

[iii]The author identifies 'plague' (nega) as originating from Samael (abbreviated as ס״מ), the angelic figure associated with death and the satan in Jewish mysticism.

[iv]The foundation (Yesod) sefirah is called 'kol' (all) in kabbalistic terminology because it channels the combined influences of all the sefirot above it.

[v]This describes the kabbalistic flow of healing energy: from Keter Elyon (Supreme Crown) through in turn receives from Tiferet, where healing and recovery come through the power of Keter Elyon.

This is the meaning of "Heal us, O Lord"—the name of Arikh Anpin (the Long-Faced One), where the essential intention lies, and healing flows through the three supernal sefirot to Chesed. The Crown (Keter) only influences the sefirot through the aspect of Chesed (Loving-kindness). "And we shall be healed" refers to below in Tiferet and Malkhut. The letters Nun and Vav represent the mystery of the souls of Israel that are attached to Tiferet (symbolized by Vav) and to Malkhut (symbolized by Nun), which need healing, and they are called "love-sick" in need of unification.[1]

If the sick person is a Torah scholar, his visiting friend should say over him: "May it be the will that you be blessed from the mouth of the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Divine Presence, in all His attributes, in His ten sefirot, in all His names, from the four pillars and six levels of His throne,[2] from all the masters of the academies, from all the angels, from all the supernal households, and from all the lower households, speedily and soon. May recovery come to you, and may He heal you from your wounds through the light of the Ancient Holy One, and may He cause salvation to spring forth for you soon. And in His abundant mercies, may He have compassion upon you together with all the sick of His people Israel who need mercy. Amen, Selah, and forever. May the words of my mouth be acceptable, etc."

Some of the wise among the people, when the Temple existed, upon entering to visit the sick, would often declare, "This one will live and this one will die"—all this from the first glance they made at the patient's face immediately upon entering his room;

[1] This references the kabbalistic concept that human souls yearn for mystical union with the divine, similar to lovers separated from their beloved, drawing on imagery from Song of Songs.

[2] This refers to the kabbalistic concept of the divine throne being supported by six directions (corresponding to the six sefirot from Chesed to Yesod), which in turn corresponds to the six days of creation.

Tiferet (Beauty/Harmony) to Malkhut (Kingdom), and from there to the angel Raphael who administers healing.

[i] This is a reference to Song of Songs 2:5 ('For I am sick with love'), interpreted kabbalistically to mean that the souls of Israel are 'lovesick' for divine unification.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase means 'from the mouth of the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Divine Presence,' representing the masculine and feminine aspects of divinity in Kabbalah.

[iii] This Aramaic phrase refers to 'masters of the academies,' the heads of the heavenly yeshivot where the souls of the righteous study Torah after death.

it would appear to them in his face whether he would live or die.[1] This is similar to what is said in Parshat Vayakhel page 207 about the High Priest's headplate (tzitz), which is called thus from the term "looking," because the priest could recognize through the power of the Divine Name's letters engraved upon it, at first glance, whether the person standing before him was righteous or wicked. He would see the light of the letters in the person's face, but afterward, when he would look more carefully, he would no longer see this, because the supernal vision is only revealed momentarily. 70R 75R

Wise nature has taught us that when a person slightly closes his eyes, forms of light appear before him, alluding to the hidden chariots which exist only when the eyes are closed, and only for an instant, in the mystery of "the living creatures ran and returned" (Ezekiel 1:14). Incidentally, we should not omit explaining the meaning of "like the appearance of a flash" as I found in Sefer Yetzirah: The observation that the sefirot observe and look at one another is like light emerging from between pottery shards. That is, if you take a pottery shard with fine holes throughout its surface and cover fire with it, then blow into the fire with bellows until it blazes, there will extend from the pathways of the holes in each opening of the shard threads and flames colored with all kinds of colors, ascending and descending in small pathways. So is the gaze of the living creatures along the pathways to the living creatures above them, for there is a throne for each throne and honor for each honor.[2] In their gazing, they send sparks of radiance in the Chashmal of various colors, and out of their fear of looking at the Divine Presence, they run back and forth from looking, like the appearance of light- 80R 85R 90R 95R 100R

[1] This passage describes what today might be called medical intuition or diagnostic insight, but attributes it to mystical perception of divine light visible in the patient's face, comparable to the High Priest's spiritual discernment.

[2] This reflects the kabbalistic principle that the divine realm contains hierarchical structures mirroring each other at different levels, with each level of reality being a reflection of the ones above it.

[i] The author connects the High Priest's headplate (tzitz) etymologically with the Hebrew word for gazing or looking (lehatzitz), emphasizing its mystical visual properties.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase means 'because supernal vision is only revealed momentarily,' explaining why spiritual insight comes in flashes rather than sustained perception.

[iii] This quote from Ezekiel 1:14 describes the heavenly creatures (chayot) that 'ran and returned,' used here to illustrate the fleeting nature of mystical perception.

[iv] The Chashmal, mentioned in Ezekiel's vision, is interpreted in Kabbalah as a brilliant angelic substance composed of speaking fire, here described as containing colorful sparks of divine radiance.

From here, the masters of mystical secrets said:[1] If you see a person who looks at you and immediately looks at the ground, then looks back at you and down again, know that he fears you. But if he does not turn away from you and does not look at the ground, know that he despises you in his heart. And in this vein it is said, "For no man shall see Me and live" (Exodus 33:20). And our Sages said: "Not even the holy living creatures."[2] 110R

And they said there in the Zohar that all brazen-faced people,[3] when they looked at the headplate [of the High Priest], their hearts would break within them,[A] and it would atone for them.[4] Similarly, anyone who smelled the smoke of the incense [would 115R

[A] Or: "their hearts would be humbled within them" — While 'break' is the literal translation of 'נשבר', the metaphorical meaning here likely refers to the breaking of pride or arrogance, which could be rendered as 'humbled' to clarify the spiritual transformation being described.

[1] The author applies esoteric kabbalistic principles of mystical vision to everyday human interactions, suggesting that patterns of eye contact reveal one's spiritual relationship to others, just as celestial beings relate to divine light.

[2] This rabbinic extension of the biblical prohibition against seeing God emphasizes that even the highest angelic beings (the chayot or living creatures in Ezekiel's vision) cannot directly perceive the divine essence, reinforcing the limits of mystical perception at all levels of creation.

[3] The Hebrew term 'עזי מצח' (azei metzach) literally means 'those with a strong forehead' and is an idiom for people who are impudent, shameless, or arrogant. In this context, it refers to individuals whose spiritual state was corrupted by pride.

[4] The text presents a mystical understanding of atonement that occurs through visual interaction with sacred objects. This reflects the kabbalistic concept that sacred Temple items could effect spiritual transformation merely through sensory contact.

[i] This quote from Exodus 33:20 explains that direct divine vision is impossible for humans to survive, used here to illustrate why even celestial beings must avert their gaze from the Divine Presence.

[ii] Cf. Zohar, Parshat Shelach — The author cites this Zohar passage to establish the mystical understanding of illness as connected to demonic forces, particularly Lilith, who represents the feminine aspect of impurity. | Cf. Psalm 91:10-11 — These biblical verses are used as protective formulas when visiting the sick, with the author giving them kabbalistic interpretation relating to protection from demonic forces. | Cf. Saba (section of Zohar) — This reference connects the angel Raphael with divine healing powers, establishing a kabbalistic framework for understanding the spiritual mechanics of healing. | Cf. Ezekiel 1:14 — This biblical verse about divine vision is used to explain the fleeting nature of spiritual insight, particularly how mystical perception occurs in momentary flashes. | Cf. Sefer Yetzirah — This early kabbalistic text is cited to explain the complex interrelationships between the divine emanations (sefirot) through the metaphor of colored light shining through pottery. | Cf. Exodus 33:20 — This verse is applied to explain the mystical concept that direct divine vision is dangerous, requiring mediated perception through momentary glimpses rather than sustained gaze.

[iii] The tzitz was the golden headplate worn by the High Priest in the Temple, inscribed with the words 'Holy to the Lord.' According to rabbinic tradition, it had the power to atone for sins of arrogance.

Through that permitted fragrance,[2] impurity would depart from him, and he would have only one heart directed toward his Father in heaven.[B]

Chapter 3

The sick person should not attribute the cause of their illness to any chance occurrence, such as food or drink. Even if evil people have harmed them, they

[A] Or: "Similarly, anyone who inhaled the smoke of the incense [would experience this effect]" — The Hebrew verb 'מריח' specifically indicates smelling, but 'inhaled' might better convey the physical interaction with the incense smoke in this ritual context.

[B] Or: "and he would have a single-minded devotion to his Father in heaven" — The phrase 'לב אחד' (one heart) is an idiom suggesting undivided loyalty or single-minded devotion, which might be clearer in English with this alternate phrasing.

[1] This phrase appears to be a rabbinic principle explaining why one cannot fulfill a religious obligation through a prohibited act. Here it explains why the beneficial effects of the incense couldn't be experienced during the prohibited phase of the offering.

[2] The passage distinguishes between prohibited benefit from the incense during its active offering and permitted benefit after the smoke had risen, suggesting that even indirect exposure to Temple rituals could have purifying effects.

[i] Me'ilah refers to the prohibition against deriving personal benefit from consecrated Temple property. The text distinguishes between the prohibited stage of the incense offering (during its rising) and the permitted stage (after the column of smoke had formed).

[ii] This refers to a chapter in the Talmudic tractate Pesachim (26a) which discusses the laws of deriving benefit from consecrated items.

[iii] Zohama is a kabbalistic term for spiritual impurity or contamination that adheres to the soul. It is often described as originating from the primordial serpent in Eden and affecting humanity after Adam's sin.

[iv] The concept of having "one heart toward Heaven" appears in rabbinic literature as the ideal spiritual state of complete devotion, contrasted with a "divided heart" that is pulled toward worldly concerns.

[v] Cf. Zohar, Vayakhel — The reference to the Zohar comes from Parashat Vayakhel, which discusses how the High Priest's headplate revealed a person's spiritual state through divine illumination, causing the wicked to experience inner transformation when exposed to its holiness. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Pesachim — The citation of 'Kol Sha'ah' refers to a chapter in Tractate Pesachim that establishes the principle that deriving benefit from sound, sight, or smell of sacred items does not constitute me'ilah (misappropriation), though rabbinic prohibitions might still apply. | Cf. Keritot — While not directly quoted, this passage alludes to Talmudic discussions about the Temple incense that describe its purifying qualities, particularly its ability to remove spiritual impurity (zohama) and create spiritual unity in those who experienced it.

[vi] The Hebrew term 'keri' (קרי) has multiple meanings that create a rich theological wordplay here. It can mean 'chance/coincidence,' 'seminal emission,' or 'encounter.' The author is arguing against attributing illness to random chance rather than divine providence.

אדם הרעים יאמר כי עונותיו
גרמו לו בדכתיב אם תהיה רעה
בעיר וה׳ לא עשה.[i] וכן כתיב
תיסרך רעתך. ותמוגנו ביד
עוונינו. רוחכם אש תאכלכם וכל
התולה מאורעיו על צד הקרי
הוא נמשך אחר הכח הטומאה
שלצד צפון[ii] הנקרא קרי ומפתח
ההוא יוצא כח הרוגז ח״ו ואלה
הם המשוטטים בלילה[iii] ולכן
נקראים בעלי קרי:[iv] [v]

should say that their sins have caused this,[1] as it is written: "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord has not done it?" Similarly, it is written: "Your wickedness shall chastise you," and "We melt away in the hand of our iniquities," and "Your breath is a fire that shall consume you." Anyone who attributes their circumstances to chance is drawn after the power of impurity from the northern side,[2] which is called "chance" (keri), and from that opening emerges the power of anger, God forbid. These are the forces that wander at night, and therefore they are called "masters of chance."[3]

אם יש לחולה שום נדר יזהר
להתיר אותו והעומדים עליו
יזהירוהו על זה כי אמרו שאין
התרת נדרים מסורה למלאכי
השרת.[vi] ואולי כי דוקא אנשים

If the sick person has made any vow, he should be careful to annul it,[4] and those attending to him should warn him about this, for they said that the annulment of vows is not entrusted to the ministering angels. Perhaps this is because

[1] This reflects the common theological position in rabbinic Judaism that illness and suffering should be understood as divine correction rather than random misfortune, encouraging self-examination rather than blaming external causes.

[2] The translation simplifies complex kabbalistic terminology about the 'northern side' (צד צפון), which in Jewish mysticism represents the source of divine judgment and demonic forces, as opposed to the 'southern side' associated with divine mercy.

[3] The Hebrew 'ba'alei keri' (בעלי קרי) has a double meaning that's difficult to capture in English. It literally refers to men who have experienced nocturnal emissions (requiring ritual purification) but is used here metaphorically for those who attribute events to chance rather than divine providence. The author creates a wordplay connecting this ritual impurity with spiritual error.

[4] The Hebrew term "hatarat nedarim" refers to a formal process of annulling vows through a tribunal of three Jewish men (or one rabbi in some cases).

[i] From Amos 3:6, a verse often cited in rabbinic literature to support the theological principle that all events, including suffering, ultimately derive from divine providence.

[ii] In Kabbalistic cosmology, the northern side (tzad tzafon) is associated with demonic forces, impurity, and the left side of the divine system. This reflects the concept found in the Zohar that the north is the source of judgment and demonic forces.

[iii] This refers to demonic forces believed to be most active at night. The connection between 'keri' and nocturnal wandering may also allude to nocturnal emissions, considered spiritually problematic in rabbinic and kabbalistic thought.

[iv] The term 'ba'alei keri' traditionally refers to men who have experienced nocturnal emissions and thus require ritual purification. Here, the author creatively extends this term to those who attribute events to chance rather than divine providence, suggesting this attitude creates spiritual impurity.

[v] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Siftei Tzedek, Chapter on Suffering as Divine Correction — This passage builds on the earlier theological framework by addressing how the sick person should interpret their suffering—as divinely ordained rather than random chance. | Cf. Zohar — The text draws on kabbalistic cosmology from the Zohar that associates the northern direction with the sitra achra (other side) and demonic forces, contrasting with the south which represents divine mercy. | Cf. Talmud — The author is drawing on the rabbinic tradition that interprets suffering as a form of divine correction rather than random misfortune, encouraging the sick to examine their deeds rather than blaming external factors.

[vi] This is a rabbinic teaching found in the Talmud (Nedarim 10a). It means that only humans, not angels, have the authority to annul vows, emphasizing that this is a distinctly human religious power.

שהם בעלי בחירה[i] עוקרים האיסור מעל הנודר ומעמידים אותו בבחירתו כמאז ואין לחוש להתבטל מדברי תורה ומצוה כדי לבקר החולה דכתיב אשרי משכיל אל דל:[iii ii]

only humans, who possess free will, can remove the prohibition from the one who made the vow and restore him to his original state of choice.[C] And one should not be concerned about neglecting words of Torah and commandments in order to visit the sick, as it is written: "Happy is he who considers the poor."[1]

וראוי להודיע לחולה כי מי שלא ידע ביום טובה להצדיק רחמי שמים בכשרון המעשה. הנה מה טוב ומה נעים אם יצדק דין היסורים על עצמו ביום רעה. כדאמרו בב״ר על פסוק והנה טוב מאד זו מדת יסורים דכתיב ודרך חיים תוכחות מוסר וכתיב ואני יסרתי ובזה חזקתי זרועותם. ולאלה הצדיקים המקיימים בעצמם כך. יצדק בלי ספק שבמיתתם קרויים חיים עלייהו כתיב ומשביע לכל חי רצון כפי עילוי נשמתם באותה שעה להדבק ברצון העליון: וכתיב אך בשרו עליו יכאב ונפשו עליו תאבל למד על כל מי שאינו מתאבל על עצמו

The sick person should be informed that one who did not know how to justify God's mercy through proper conduct in times of good fortune would do well to justify the judgment of suffering upon himself[2] in times of hardship. As they said in Bereshit Rabbah on the verse "And behold, it was very good"—this refers to the attribute of suffering, as it is written, "The way of life is through disciplinary reproof" and "I have chastened them and strengthened their arms." For these righteous ones who fulfill this within themselves, it is undoubtedly true that in their death they are called living; of them it is written, "He satisfies every living thing with favor," according to the elevation of their souls at that time to cleave to the Supreme Will.

And it is written, "Yet his flesh shall feel pain, and his soul shall mourn over him." This teaches that whoever does not mourn over himself but rather over his sins, and rejoices in suffering for the glory

[C] Or: "This may be because specifically humans, as beings with free will, uproot the prohibition from the one who vowed and reestablish him in his original state of choice." — This alternate translation more literally renders the Hebrew terms "oqrim" (uproot) and "ke-me'az" (as before/originally), which carry specific connotations in Jewish legal discourse about returning a person to their pre-vow state.

[1] While the literal meaning of this verse refers to the poor, Jewish tradition interprets "dal" to include the sick, which is why this verse is cited as a justification for visiting the sick taking priority over Torah study.

[2] The Hebrew phrase "יצדק דין היסורים" literally means to "justify the judgment of sufferings," referring to the religious concept of accepting divine judgment as just, even when it brings suffering.

[i] The concept of "free will" (baalei bechirah) is significant in Jewish theology. The author suggests that humans' ability to annul vows stems from their possession of free will, which angels lack.

[ii] A quote from Psalm 41:2, which literally means "Happy is he who considers the poor." In this context, "dal" (poor) is interpreted to include the sick, suggesting that attending to the sick takes precedence over other religious obligations.

[iii] Cf. Talmud Nedarim 10a — The author cites this Talmudic principle to emphasize the human role in religious ritual, particularly regarding vows. This reference establishes the importance of human intervention for the sick person who needs vows annulled. | Cf. Talmud Nedarim 8a — While not directly quoted, this passage likely informs the author's emphasis on annulling vows for the sick. The Talmud suggests that unfulfilled vows can be a cause of illness, making their annulment potentially curative. | Cf. Psalm 41:2 — The author uses this verse to establish the priority of visiting the sick over other religious obligations, interpreting "dal" (poor) to include the sick, a common rabbinic interpretation.

of Heaven[1]—his flesh will not feel pain in life or in death. Heaven will have mercy on him so that he will not feel his suffering, like those who die for the sanctification of God's name, whose souls depart like a fish drawn from milk.

And any person, even one who dies in his bed, can fulfill within himself the ability to die for the unification of the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Divine Presence. Especially if he directed his prayers and commandments—particularly the Shema Yisrael recitation, the Sim Shalom blessing[2] for supreme unification, and the Nefilat Apayim prostration[3] to surrender his soul to complete the unification and divine coupling[4]—then at the time of his death, for the unification of His name, he will bring completion and great illumination to all the forms of unifications he effected and performed throughout his life. Thus it was foretold many times to Rabbi Joseph Karo, "You will be burned for the sanctification of My name," which hinted at the purpose of his death, even though he passed away with a good name in his bed—"Let the pious exult in glory."

Chapter 4

אין לדבר בעון שעשה החולה
אלא לעצמו כדי שישוב בתשובה
ויפרש חטאיו לפני קונו: [ii] ובזהר

One should not speak about the sin that the sick person has committed except to the person themselves,[5] so that they may repent and specify their

[1] "For the glory of Heaven" (לכבוד שמים) is a Hebrew idiom meaning for God's honor or to sanctify God's name through one's actions.

[2] This refers to the final blessing of the Amidah prayer, which asks for peace. In kabbalistic interpretation, it represents divine unification.

[3] A prayer ritual involving bowing and covering one's face, performed after the Amidah. In mystical understanding, it symbolizes self-sacrifice and soul surrender to God.

[4] The term "זיוג" (coupling) in kabbalistic texts refers to the mystical union of divine attributes, particularly the masculine and feminine aspects of God (Tiferet and Malkhut).

[5] This ethical guideline reflects the Jewish value of avoiding lashon hara (evil speech) while still encouraging personal repentance. It balances pastoral care with respect for the sick person's dignity.

[i] Cf. Bereshit Rabbah 9:7 — The author uses this midrashic interpretation to establish a theological framework where suffering is understood as divinely ordained for spiritual benefit rather than random misfortune. | Cf. Proverbs 6:23 — The text cites this verse to support the theological claim that suffering serves as correction that leads to spiritual life rather than mere punishment. | Cf. Hosea 7:15 — This prophetic verse is cited to show that divine chastisement has a strengthening effect, supporting the text's positive view of suffering. | Cf. Zohar, Vayakhel 211b — The author draws on this Zoharic imagery to describe the ideal death experience for the righteous as a painless separation of soul from body. | Cf. Maggid Mesharim — The reference to Rabbi Karo receiving messages about being "burned for the sanctification of My name" likely comes from this mystical diary, though the author reinterprets this prediction spiritually since Karo died naturally.

[ii] This opening line establishes an important ethical principle for those visiting the sick: one should not publicly discuss the sick person's sins, but may speak privately with them to encourage repentance.

פרשת בא דף מ״א מתבאר צורך פרוט החטא דבהא ליח למקטרגא פטרא דפומא גביה ואתפרש מניה[i] אך אם חוזר לסורו מזכיר לו המקטרג כל העונות כי הודוי מושך הפגם מהמקומות העליונים למטה ובזה חותם פי השטן שלא יסטין[ii] מפני שמשפיע לו שפע וחלק התמצית הראוי להם ועוד שהקב״ה אומר לו מה לך עוד עמו. ובתפלות היום השכינה מקבלת אפילו חלק החצונים מלמעלה להשפיעם בלילה בסוד תפלת ערבית בעת שהיא מחלקת שלל לאגפיה[iii] והוא סוד המותר והשחרות והפגם הנעשה וזהו ויבאו בני האלהים וגו׳ ויבא גם השטן בתוכם ליקח חלקו. ואז״ל כי ביחוד תפלת שחרית ומנחה שהם בסוד חבוק ב׳ דרועין[iv] מקבלת חלק הקדושה והשחרות מתרחק בודוי האדם בסוד אור י״ג מדות עליונות[v] ויורד מדרגה אחר מדרגה עד למטה ומשם sins before their Creator. In the Zohar, Parashat Bo, page 41, the necessity of detailing one's sin is explained, for in this way the accuser has no opening to speak against them, and separates from them. However, if one returns to their sinful ways, the accuser reminds them of all their iniquities, because confession draws the spiritual blemish down from the upper realms,[1] thereby sealing the mouth of Satan so he cannot prosecute, since [through confession] one channels to him the appropriate flow and portion that is due to him.[2] Furthermore, the Holy One, blessed be He, says to him, "What more do you want with him?"

During the daytime prayers, the Divine Presence receives even the portion of the external forces from above, to channel it to them at night through the mystery of the evening prayer, when She distributes spoils to her legions.[3] This is the secret of the excess, the darkness, and the blemish that is created, as it is written: "The sons of God came, etc., and Satan came also among them" to take his portion. Our Sages taught that through the unification of the morning and afternoon prayers, which represent the embrace of the two arms,[4] She receives the portion of holiness, and the darkness is distanced through a person's confession, through the light of the thir-

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic understanding that human actions have cosmic consequences. Confession is not merely psychological but causes actual metaphysical changes in spiritual realms.

[2] This presents a sophisticated theological concept: rather than simply eliminating negative forces, confession properly channels their energy to its appropriate place in the cosmic order.

[3] The Divine Presence (Shekhinah) is portrayed in feminine terms, consistent with kabbalistic tradition. Her distribution of spiritual energies during evening prayer represents the cosmic balance between day (dominance of holiness) and night (when external forces receive their portion).

[4] This metaphor reveals how prayer is understood in physical, anthropomorphic terms, with morning and afternoon prayers representing a cosmic embrace that unifies different divine attributes.

[i] The Aramaic phrase "ליח למקטרגא פטרא דפומא גביה" means "the accuser has no opening of the mouth against him." This reflects the kabbalistic belief that confessing sins prevents spiritual accusers from using those sins against the person in heavenly judgment.

[ii] This expresses the kabbalistic concept that confession (vidui) has metaphysical effects, literally drawing spiritual blemishes downward from higher realms, which neutralizes Satan's ability to act as prosecutor in the divine court.

[iii] This passage reflects the kabbalistic view that the daily prayer cycle participates in cosmic processes where the Shekhinah (Divine Presence) manages the distribution of spiritual energies, including portions given to the "external forces" (forces of impurity) during evening prayer.

[v] The "light of the thirteen supernal attributes" refers to the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy, which in Kabbalah represent divine compassion that can overcome judgment and are invoked in prayers for forgiveness.

נזון החצוני ויש לו ידים להיות נמשך דרך צנור מיוחד לבל יתערב בחלק הקדושה[i] ומשם יורד להנתן במצולות ים למקום הראוי לו ואם ח״ו חוזר לסורו אחר שהתודה חוזרים העונות שהשפיע מקודם לחצונים ונעורים למעלה ומסתלקי׳ משם למעלה ח״ו וזהו כונת ספר הזהר פר׳ פקודי דאמר נטלי לון מההוא סטרא בעל כרחיה וחיל בלע ויקיאנו.[ii] ולזה מקטרג. והוסיף להודיע לנו בפרשה בא בדף הנ״ל כח ההבל הקדוש העולה מפי האדם כי הוא להב אש קדוש וטהור[iii] העולה בסוד כח רוחניות הב׳ צורות קדושות הה׳ אותיות ע״י חמש מוצאות שהם מחסד עד הוד[iv] בכח נשמת הנקודות. קצת מהם על האותיות. מהם בתוכיותן. מהם למטן. בסוד ה׳ מלכים שהם הספירות במקומן וה׳ עבדים שהוא מציאותן במלכות למטה.[v] והשב״א עבד עבדים והוא עבד משכיל מושל

teen supernal attributes.[1] It descends level by level until it reaches the bottom, and from there the external force is nourished. It has "hands" to be drawn through a special channel so as not to intermingle with the portion of holiness, and from there it descends to be cast into the depths of the sea, to the place appropriate for it. 30R 35R

If, heaven forbid, one returns to their sinful ways after having confessed, the sins that were previously channeled to the external forces return and are awakened above,[2] and ascend from there upwards, heaven forbid. This is the intention of the Zohar in Parashat Pekudei, which states: "They take them from that side against its will, and 'the wealth he has swallowed he will vomit up.'" For this reason, he accuses. 40R

The Zohar further informs us in Parashat Bo on the aforementioned page about the power of the sacred breath that rises from a person's mouth,[3] for it is a holy and pure flame that rises through the mystery of the spiritual power of the two holy forms of the five letters through the five points of articulation, which extend from Chesed to Hod[4] through the power of the soul of the vowel points. Some of them are above the letters, some within them, and some below them, through the mystery of the five kings, which are the Sefirot in their places, and the five 45R 50R 55R

[1] The Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (Exodus 34:6-7) are invoked during confession, and are understood here as actual divine light that transforms and redirects negative spiritual energies.

[2] This presents the serious kabbalistic understanding of backsliding after confession—it doesn't merely return one to their previous state but actively worsens their spiritual condition by reactivating sins that had been neutralized.

[3] The Hebrew term 'hevel' (breath) connects to Genesis where God breathes life into humans. In Kabbalah, human breath in prayer is understood as a holy substance with actual power to ascend through spiritual realms.

[4] This passage correlates physical speech production with the structure of divine attributes (Sefirot), showing how the kabbalistic worldview integrates physical, psychological, and metaphysical dimensions into a unified system.

[i] This reflects the kabbalistic concept that even negative forces have a legitimate place in the divine order and must receive their sustenance, but through designated channels that prevent them from interfering with holiness.

[ii] This is a quote from Job 20:15, "He swallows wealth, but will vomit it up," used here to describe how external forces must relinquish what they have taken when a person repents.

[iii] This portrays human speech, particularly in prayer, as literally creating holy fire that ascends through spiritual realms, emphasizing the power and importance of confession and prayer.

[iv] The "five points of articulation" refers to the five places in the mouth where Hebrew letters are formed (throat, palate, tongue, teeth, and lips), which are correlated here with five of the lower Sefirot: Chesed, Gevurah, Tiferet, Netzach, and Hod.

[v] This describes how the five Sefirot (Chesed through Hod) exist both in their own place (as "kings") and as they are reflected in the lowest Sefirah of Malkhut (as "servants"), creating a mirror relationship between upper and lower realms.

servants, which are their manifestation in Malkhut below. The Sheva is the servant of servants, yet it is a wise servant that sometimes rules. All the spirituality mentioned is awakened through the power of human breath in songs, hymns, and prayer. 60R

ואמר שבסיפור יציאת מצרים בכל יום ישראל יהבי חילא למריהון דאתוסף גבורתיה כד משבחן גבורתיה וכלהו דחלין מיניה וספור גאולה זו הוא הכנה לביאת משיח צדקנו.[iii] כי יציאת מצרים היה מסטרא דיובלא שהיא בחינת הבינה בגבורה[iv] דהיינו אילו של יצחק ומשם נמשך גאולה בלתי שלימה ולכן גאולת מצרי׳ לא היתה שלימה. אמנם יש שופר גדול שהוא בחינת

He said that when Israel recounts the Exodus from Egypt every day, they give strength to their Master,[1] increasing His might as they praise His power, and all fear Him. This recounting of redemption is a preparation for the coming of our righteous Messiah. For the Exodus from Egypt came from the side of the Jubilee, which is the aspect of Binah within Gevurah,[A] namely the ram of Isaac, and from there flowed an incomplete redemption. Therefore, the redemption from Egypt was not complete. However, there is a great shofar, which is the aspect of Binah within Chokhmah, from which it is great from the side of Gedulah, the kindness of Abraham, and 65R 70R

[A] Or: "the Exodus from Egypt emanated from the aspect of Jubilee, representing Understanding (Binah) within the sefirah of Strength (Gevurah)" — This alternative provides more explicit explanation of the kabbalistic terms, making it clearer to readers unfamiliar with these concepts.

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic concept that human actions and prayers have the power to strengthen divine attributes. The Aramaic phrase 'יהבי חילא למריהון' conveys the idea that humans can actually augment divine power through proper spiritual actions.

[i] The Sheva (a Hebrew vowel point) is described as the "servant of servants," yet paradoxically as a "wise servant that sometimes rules," reflecting the kabbalistic principle that even the lowest elements contain hidden power and significance.

[ii] Cf. Zohar, Parashat Bo, folio 41 — The author uses this Zohar passage as the primary source for explaining the cosmic mechanics of confession and its effects on both the confessing person and the broader spiritual realms, establishing the metaphysical rationale for the Jewish practice of confession (vidui). | Cf. Zohar, Parashat Pekudei — The author cites this to explain the consequences of returning to sin after confession, showing how this creates a spiritual deficit by forcing the reactivation of sins that had been properly channeled. | Cf. Book of Job 20:15 — The author applies this verse metaphorically to describe how external spiritual forces must surrender the spiritual energy they received through a person's sins when that person confesses properly. | Cf. Jewish liturgy—Daily prayer cycle — The author provides a kabbalistic interpretation of the standard Jewish prayer cycle, explaining how each prayer service has a specific cosmic function in managing the flow of spiritual energies between divine and negative forces. | Cf. Kabbalistic doctrine of the Sefirot — The author integrates the structure of the Sefirot with the mechanics of human speech and prayer, showing how the physical act of confession creates ripples through the entire divine system. | Cf. Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (Exodus 34:6-7) — The author portrays these attributes as actual spiritual light that transforms negative energies during confession, connecting Biblical theology with kabbalistic practice.

[iii] This establishes a mystical connection between the daily recounting of the Exodus and the future messianic redemption, suggesting that the former actively prepares for the latter through spiritual channels.

[iv] The text presents a kabbalistic analysis of the Exodus using the language of sefirot (divine emanations). It associates the Exodus with 'Jubilee' (the 50th year in the biblical cycle), which represents Binah (Understanding) operating through Gevurah (Judgment/Strength), explaining why this redemption was imperfect.

from there mercy is aroused, not judgments. The one who blows this shofar for redemption is Chokhmah (Wisdom),[A] and from there will flow the redemption with great mercies that will not be followed by exile.[1] In any case, the remembrance of the Exodus from Egypt is an awakening for the future, not like the coming of Sarah.[2] And in Parshat Beshalach page 48, it explains how through the miracles of Egypt, the power of all the structure of the external forces was broken. Therefore, it is an obligation upon every person to constantly recount before the Holy One, blessed be He, all the miracles He performed for him, for a miracle is an awakening of Yesod, and wonders are a revelation of Binah in the fifty gates,[3] when it is connected to Chokhmah and Keter.

Additionally, in another way, the glory of God is elevated and the power of the external forces is weakened, and this is through one who occupies himself in this world with returning the wicked to repentance.[4] And it is written in Parshat Terumah page 128-129 that there is no commandment more desirable above than this one. For first, it weakens the power of the Other Side and causes the Holy One, blessed be He, to be elevated in His glory, and sustains the entire world above and below. Such a person sees children for his children and merits both [A] Or: "The divine attribute of Wisdom (Chokhmah) is what sounds this shofar for redemption" — This clarifies that Chokhmah is not a person blowing the shofar but rather the divine attribute itself that activates the redemptive process.

[1] The text distinguishes between the historical Exodus (which was followed by later exiles) and the future messianic redemption, which is described as permanent and complete. This reflects the traditional Jewish belief in an ultimate redemption that will permanently end exile.

[2] This puzzling phrase might be a scribal error or an obscure reference. It could refer to Sarah's temporary residence in Egypt (Genesis 12) as a contrast to the complete redemption, or it may allude to some teaching about Sarah that was known to the author's contemporaries.

[3] The text offers a kabbalistic distinction between different types of divine interventions. 'Miracle' (nes) connects to Yesod, the sefirah that channels divine flow into our world, while 'wonders' (nifla'ot) connect to Binah operating through its '50 gates,' representing higher forms of revelation.

[4] The text identifies helping others repent as the highest spiritual achievement, surpassing all other commandments. This reflects a core theme in Jewish mysticism that interpersonal spiritual assistance has profound cosmic effects.

[i] This refers to the 'great shofar' mentioned in Isaiah 27:13 that will herald the messianic redemption. The text interprets this eschatologically, explaining that the final redemption will come through Binah (Understanding) working through Chokhmah (Wisdom) rather than through Gevurah (Judgment).

[ii] Unlike a human blowing a physical shofar, this refers to the divine attribute of Wisdom (Chokhmah) itself activating the redemptive process through cosmic channels.

[iii] The text distinguishes between 'nes' (miracle) and 'nifla'ot' (wonders) in kabbalistic terms: miracles correspond to the sefirah of Yesod (Foundation), while wonders correspond to Binah (Understanding) operating through its 'fifty gates,' a concept found in rabbinic literature referring to the highest levels of spiritual insight.

this world and the World to Come. No masters of judgment can judge him, neither in this world nor in the World to Come. He enters through the thirteen gates with none to protest, and his image is established before the Supernal King.[1] He is blessed with all the blessings with which Abraham was blessed when he made those souls in Haran.

I found that Haran was a place prepared to bring converts under the wings of the Divine Presence more than any other place. Its numerical value equals three times Elohim, for Abraham sweetened all the harsh judgments there. And in Abraham's union with his wife, he did not labor in vain like Adam in the 130 years. And likewise regarding Eve, they said in Midrash Rabbah that she is called "mother of all living." Therefore they said that there are spirits of the house and spirits of the field. But Abraham and Sarah's drops were clothed with souls. Therefore Abraham is called the father of many nations, and Sarah converted the women, and this is "the souls that they made in Haran,"[2] precisely as they said in Parshat Terumah page 147. They were the first rectification of Adam and his wife,[3] and what they damaged, Abraham and Sarah repaired in the aspect of one part of the souls of Adam and Eve. For the other two parts were rectified through Isaac and Rebecca, and Jacob and his wives.[4] He also rectified

[1] This suggests that one who helps others repent receives the honor of having their spiritual image or form permanently established in the divine presence, a profound mystical reward.

[2] This interprets Genesis 12:5 ('the souls that they had made in Haran') as referring to Abraham and Sarah's conversion of others. Traditional Jewish interpretation understands this verse as indicating that Abraham and Sarah brought others to monotheistic faith.

[3] The text presents Abraham and Sarah's spiritual work as a cosmic repair (tikkun) of the damage caused by Adam and Eve's sin. This reflects the kabbalistic concept that later biblical figures rectify aspects of Adam's original sin.

[4] According to this kabbalistic interpretation, each of the patriarchs and matriarchs repaired dif-

[i] The 'thirteen gates' likely refers to the thirteen attributes of divine mercy. The passage suggests that one who returns others to repentance gains special access to these divine channels of mercy without opposition.

[ii] This presents a mystical geography where certain physical locations have spiritual properties. Haran is portrayed as having special qualities for converting souls, which explains why Abraham and Sarah were particularly successful there.

[iii] This uses gematria (Hebrew numerology) to explain Haran's spiritual significance. The name חרן equals 258, which is 3 times the value of אלהים (86), the divine name associated with judgment. Abraham's spiritual work there 'sweetened' (transformed) these judgments into mercy.

[iv] This references the rabbinic tradition that Adam separated from Eve for 130 years after their sin (based on Genesis 5:3), during which time his emissions produced demonic spirits. In contrast, Abraham and Sarah's union was always spiritually productive.

[v] This Aramaic phrase distinguishes between 'spirits of the house' and 'spirits of the field,' referring to the kabbalistic belief that Adam's emissions during his separation from Eve produced different types of demons, contrasted with Abraham and Sarah's spiritually productive union.

the children of Keturah by giving them a name of impurity, as we will explain later, that these matters are not according to their plain meaning.

At the end of the Zohar's words, it states that no reward reaches the reward of these people, and if people knew this, they would pursue it like one who pursues life.[A1] This is a great healing for the sinner, to turn many from iniquity. Another merit of the one who repents is that the flame rising from his broken spirit in detailing his sins, besides increasing the power of holiness, also weakens the power of impurity, as in "If your enemy is hungry, feed him bread, and if he is thirsty, give him water" appropriate for them, which are the sins. For this is not honor to him, but rather "you heap coals of fire upon his head,"[2] like coals of broom trees and the river of fire made from the sweat of the Holy Beasts[3] that flows to Gehenna. This is the secret of Haman being invited to the feast that Esther made, and the secret of the "feast of rich foods, a feast of aged wines"[4] written in Isaiah. In this way, they are "mute dogs that cannot bark."[5] The breaking of his spirit in confession is certainly "the sacrifices of God."[6] Therefore,

[A] Or: "like one who chases after eternal life" — This idiomatic Aramaic expression could be rendered more explicitly to emphasize the spiritual dimension of 'life' being pursued, as it refers to spiritual rather than merely physical existence.

ferent aspects of Adam and Eve's sin, with Abraham and Sarah addressing one dimension, Isaac and Rebecca another, and Jacob and his wives yet another.

[1] This emphasizes that if people truly understood the spiritual merit of helping others repent, they would eagerly seek opportunities to do so, recognizing it as the path to the highest spiritual attainment.

[2] This creatively reinterprets Proverbs 25:21-22 in a mystical context. Just as feeding an enemy paradoxically places 'coals on their head,' confessing sins to God paradoxically weakens rather than strengthens the negative spiritual forces associated with those sins.

[3] This refers to the kabbalistic concept of 'nehar dinur' (river of fire), which is described in the mystical literature as formed from the perspiration of the holy creatures (chayot) that bear the divine throne, as described in Ezekiel's vision.

[4] This quotes Isaiah 25:6, which describes the messianic banquet at the end of days. The text creates a complex mystical parallel between Esther's feast (which led to Haman's downfall), Isaiah's messianic banquet, and the confession of sins.

[5] This quotes Isaiah 56:10, where it describes negligent spiritual leaders. Here it's applied to negative spiritual forces that are rendered powerless ('mute') through proper confession.

[6] This refers to Psalm 51:19, 'The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit,' suggesting that the contrition expressed in confession serves as a spiritual sacrifice that replaces the physical sacrifices offered in the Temple.

[i] This refers to Abraham's children with Keturah (Genesis 25:1-6). The text suggests Abraham performed a spiritual rectification by giving them 'a name of impurity,' possibly referring to his sending them away from Isaac with gifts, which kabbalists interpreted as containing elements of controlled impurity.

[ii] The text creatively reinterprets Proverbs 25:21-22, suggesting that when one confesses sins, one 'feeds' one's spiritual enemies (negative forces) their appropriate 'food' (the acknowledged sins), which paradoxically weakens them rather than strengthens them.

הנעשה מזיעתן של חיות הנמשך לגיהנם. והיינו סוד המן אל המשתה אשר עשתה אסתר.[i] וסוד משתה שמנים משתה שמרים הכתוב בישעיה ובזה הם כלבים אלמים שלא יוכלו לנבוח. ושברון רוחו בודוי הם זבחי אלהים ודאי. ולכן חלמא בישא עציבותיה מסתייהו[ii] תו לא שליט דינא עלוהי דזבח דאתחזי למדת דינא אקריב גביה:[iii]

And if this breath [of confession][1] rises amidst tears, especially from one lying on a sickbed with the Divine Presence above his head,[2] surely his words will be sweetened in his mouth and accepted favorably. There is no gate that will not be broken[3] by one who returns in repentance, and all decrees and judgments are shattered, along with many chains of iron,[4] and 155R

[1]The original Hebrew term 'hevel' (הבל) means breath or vapor and refers to the confession mentioned in the previous passage. I added '[of confession]' for clarity.

[2]This refers to the Jewish belief that the Shekhinah (Divine Presence) hovers above a sick person's bed, making their prayers especially potent.

[3]The original uses Aramaic metaphorical language describing repentance as a force that can break through all spiritual barriers or gates that might otherwise prevent one's prayers from ascending to heaven.

[4]These metaphors describe divine punishments or consequences of sin that are canceled through

[i]This creates a mystical interpretation of Esther inviting Haman to her feast, suggesting it parallels how confession offers sins to the negative forces, ultimately leading to their downfall rather than empowerment.

[ii]This Aramaic phrase comes from the Talmud (Berakhot 55b) and means 'for a bad dream, its sadness is sufficient.' The text applies this principle to confession of sins, suggesting that the distress of acknowledgment itself serves as atonement.

[iii]Cf. Zohar, Beshalach — The text directly references this Zohar passage to establish the cosmic significance of recounting the Exodus, showing how it weakens negative spiritual forces and prepares for the ultimate redemption. | Cf. Zohar, Terumah — This reference establishes the author's view on the highest spiritual achievement—helping others repent—by citing the Zohar's detailed explanation of the cosmic benefits and eternal rewards for this action. | Cf. Zohar, Terumah — This reference supports the author's kabbalistic interpretation of Abraham and Sarah's role in rectifying Adam and Eve's sin through their work converting others. | Cf. Midrash Rabbah on Genesis — The author uses this midrashic interpretation to compare Eve's motherhood with Sarah's spiritual motherhood through conversion, establishing a pattern of rectification. | Cf. Proverbs 25:21-22 — The author creatively reinterprets this verse in a mystical context, suggesting that confession and repentance 'feed' the negative forces their appropriate nourishment (sins), which paradoxically weakens them like coals of fire on the head. | Cf. Isaiah 25:6 — The author creates a complex mystical interpretation connecting Esther's feast (to which Haman was invited), Isaiah's messianic banquet, and the confession of sins as ways of weakening negative spiritual forces.

[iv]The term 'hevel' (breath/vapor) refers to the confession mentioned in the previous passage. In Kabbalistic thought, the breath of prayer and confession has spiritual substance that ascends through cosmic realms.

[v]This references the Talmudic teaching (Shabbat 12b) that the Divine Presence hovers above the head of a sick person, creating a particularly sacred space for prayer and confession.

[vi]This is in Aramaic: "There is no gate that is not broken by one who returns in repentance." The metaphor portrays repentance as a force capable of breaking through all spiritual barriers.

גזירין ודינין וכמה שלשלאין דפרזלא[i] ולית מאן דקיימא קמי תשובה.[ii] אך צריך לעשותה בעודו בתקפו כי לא לאיש הולך וחכין את צעדו.[iii] ויהי מה יפה לעולם תשובה ואפי׳ אחר גזר דין.[iv] עיין בסבא דף ק״ו.[v] ושם פירשו ואשלם נחומים לו ולאבליו.[vi] ונקרא בעל תשובה משום דאחיד באילן החיים דביה תליא תשובה.[vii] וע״ד אין צדיקים גמורים יכולים לעמוד במקומו:[viii][ix]

nothing can stand before repentance. However, one must perform it while still in full strength, for it is not for one who is departing to prepare his steps. Whatever happens, repentance is always beautiful for the world, even after the decree has been sealed.[1] See the Sabba [Zohar section] page 106,[2] where they explain [the verse] "And I will restore comfort to him and to his mourners." One is called a master of repentance because he grasps the Tree of Life, in which repentance depends.[3] And regarding this, even the completely righteous cannot stand in his place.[4] 160R 165R 170R sincere repentance. The 'chains of iron' represent spiritual bondage caused by sin.

[1]This references the Jewish concept that even after God has sealed a judgment against someone (particularly during the High Holidays), sincere repentance can still reverse it.

[2]The 'Sabba' refers to a section of the Zohar called 'Sabba d'Mishpatim' (The Elder of Mishpatim), which contains mystical teachings about repentance and the soul.

[3]In Kabbalistic thought, the Tree of Life refers to the sefirah of Tiferet (Beauty/Harmony), which is associated with the attribute of mercy. True repentance connects one to this divine attribute.

[4]This refers to the Talmudic teaching (Berakhot 34b) that those who overcome sin through repentance achieve a higher spiritual level than those who never sinned at all.

[i]Another Aramaic phrase describing how repentance shatters divine decrees (gzirin), judgments (dinin), and "chains of iron" (shalshela'in d'farzela)—metaphors for harsh spiritual consequences that would otherwise bind the sinner.

[ii]Aramaic: "And nothing can stand before repentance." This emphasizes the supreme spiritual power of genuine repentance.

[iii]This phrase plays on Proverbs 16:9 ("A man's heart plans his way, but the Lord directs his steps") to emphasize that deathbed repentance may be too late for proper spiritual preparation.

[iv]This references the rabbinic teaching that repentance can overturn even a sealed divine decree, a concept particularly important in the context of illness and approaching death.

[v]This refers to a section of the Zohar known as "Sabba d'Mishpatim" (The Elder of Mishpatim), folio 106, which contains teachings about repentance and the soul.

[vi]A quotation from Isaiah 57:18, which in context refers to God's healing and comforting those who repent. The author is referencing the Zohar's interpretation of this verse.

[vii]Aramaic: "because he grasps the Tree of Life in which repentance depends." This is a kabbalistic concept linking repentance to the sefirah of Tiferet, often associated with the Tree of Life.

[viii]This references the Talmudic teaching (Berakhot 34b) that "In the place where penitents stand, even the completely righteous cannot stand," suggesting that those who overcome sin through repentance achieve a higher spiritual level than those who never sinned.

[ix]Cf. Talmud, Shabbat 12b — The author references this Talmudic teaching to emphasize why confessions and prayers of the sick are particularly potent—they occur in the immediate presence of the Divine. | Cf. Talmud, Berakhot 34b — The author quotes this Talmudic teaching to emphasize the extraordinary spiritual power of repentance, particularly when performed while seriously ill, as it elevates the penitent to heights even the perfectly righteous cannot reach. | Cf. Zohar, Sabba d'Mishpatim — The author cites this Zoharic passage to provide mystical depth to his teaching about repentance, connecting the act of confession during illness to cosmic structures and divine attributes in Kabbalistic thought. | Cf. Isaiah 57:18 — The author cites this verse as interpreted in the Zohar to demonstrate that genuine repentance, especially when accompanied by tears, leads to divine comfort and healing for both the individual and those connected to them.

person, similarly for a woman having difficulty in childbirth—whose fortune is compromised[A]—one should not mention her sin.[1] I have observed that for a woman struggling in childbirth, they bring her, through her husband, a candle from the synagogue and encourage her to light it herself. This is to remind her of the merit of candle-lighting, which is her obligation, and to pray during the lighting of Sabbath and festival candles and on Yom Kippur for her husband's life and for her children that they may merit Torah study, as stated in the Zohar. She should also reflect then on repentance regarding the three transgressions for which women die during childbirth.[2]

It is proper for a pregnant woman to be careful not to walk or even look at places of transgression, and certainly to guard herself from any taint of sin, because the fetus in her womb observes, watches, and knows much,[3] as in that story about Rabbi Joshua ben Hananiah and similar accounts. Women also need to be vigilant regarding their lives because they are positioned below on the Tree of Death,[B] and in this respect they are like David who had no life of his own.[4] To attain the supernal life, they need to guard

[A] Or: "whose astrological fortune is weakened" — The term 'mazla' (מזלא) specifically refers to astrological fortune or destiny in kabbalistic literature. This translation more explicitly captures the astrological connotation, which might be helpful for readers unfamiliar with kabbalah.

[B] Or: "on the Tree of Mortality" — 'Tree of Death' is the literal translation, but 'Tree of Mortality' might better convey the kabbalistic concept referring to the sefirotic position associated with finitude and limitation, contrasting with the 'Tree of Life.'

[1] This reflects the traditional belief that speaking about sin during times of danger might summon divine judgment. There was a particular concern about mentioning sins during childbirth, which was considered a time of judgment for women.

[2] This refers to the Talmudic teaching (Shabbat 31b-32a) that women are at risk during childbirth for negligence in three specific commandments assigned to them: niddah (family purity), challah (separating dough), and hadlakat ha-ner (candle lighting).

[3] This reflects the belief that an unborn child has spiritual awareness and is influenced by the mother's actions and environments. This concept appears in various rabbinic sources and influenced customs regarding pregnant women's behavior.

[4] This refers to the midrashic tradition that David's 70 years of life were actually given to him from Adam's original allotment. In Kabbalah, this represents how the feminine aspect of divinity

[i] The practice of bringing a candle from the synagogue to a woman in labor suggests a belief that sacred objects from holy spaces carried special protective power. This reflects the common belief that objects associated with public prayer carried heightened spiritual efficacy.

[ii] The Talmud (Shabbat 31b-32a) identifies these three transgressions as negligence in observing niddah (menstrual purity laws), challah (separating dough offering), and hadlakat ha-ner (candle lighting). The text will soon explain these in detail.

[iii] This refers to the story in the Jerusalem Talmud (Yevamot 12:6) where Rabbi Joshua's mother would bring his cradle to the study hall so that his ears would become accustomed to Torah from his earliest days. The Talmud praises her for this and attributes his wisdom to these early exposures.

היה לו חיים.[i] ולהשיג החיים העליונים צריכות להשמר בג׳ דברים שאותן עבירות גורמות דבקות החצונים אליהם והיא המיתה והקליפה הכרוכה במדתם שהמות היא נקבה נמשכת מס״מ.[ii] זהירות ראשון נדה להבדל מן החצונים שאם ח״ו יתקרבו אל הזכר הוא ע״רו״ה ולזה מיד מדת הדין תתעורר אליהן מלמעלה והמיתה כרוכה בעקבם. הב׳ אחר תקונן ורחקן מן החיצונים צריכות עוד זהירות חלה[iii] דהיינו סלוק המלכות שהיא חלה ראשית עריסותיכם העולה לידבק בימין ליחוד. ואחר זה צריכות עוד הדלקת הנר שהיא מדתן הנגזרת בסוד תקונה העליון בפתילה ושמן ועריכת נר כי הכלי ה״א והפתילה ו׳ והשמן י׳ והנר אש מצד ה׳ עליונה[iv] שממנה יצאו ה׳ אורות ולכן צריך לכוין בתקון

themselves in three matters, as those transgressions cause attachment of external forces to them, which is death and the shell (kelipah) that is bound up with their attribute—for death is female, extending from Samael.[1] 30R

The first precaution is regarding niddah (menstrual purity), to separate from the external forces, for if, God forbid, they approach the male, it constitutes nakedness. For this reason, the attribute of judgment immediately awakens toward them from above, and death is bound to their heels. The second, after their rectification and distancing from the external forces, they still need to be careful about challah, meaning the elevation of Malkhut, which is challah, "the first of your dough," ascending to adhere to the right for unification.[A] 35R 40R

After this, they still need candle-lighting, which is their attribute, ordained in the mystery of its supernal rectification with wick, oil, and the arrangement of the lamp—for the vessel is the letter hei, the wick is vav, the oil is yod, and the flame is fire from the aspect of the upper hei,[2] from which five lights emanate. Therefore, one must intend in preparing the 45R

[A] Or: "meaning the elevation of the divine attribute of Malkhut, symbolized by challah offering, "the first portion of your dough," which ascends to unite with the right side (Chesed) for divine unification" — This expanded translation more explicitly identifies Malkhut as a divine attribute and clarifies that the 'right' refers to Chesed (loving-kindness) in the kabbalistic system, making the mystical concept more accessible to readers without background in kabbalah.

(Malkhut, associated with David) receives its vitality from higher sefirot rather than having its own independent source of life.

[1] In kabbalistic literature, death is often personified as female and associated with Lilith or other female demonic entities connected to Samael (the angel of death). This reflects the gendered cosmology of medieval Jewish mysticism where feminine principles were often associated with judgment and limitation.

[2] The author maps the physical components of a lamp onto the four letters of the divine name YHVH (יהוה), transforming the mundane act of lighting candles into a cosmic ritual that symbolically unifies God's name. This exemplifies how kabbalistic thinking infused ordinary Jewish rituals with mystical significance.

[i] According to midrashic tradition, David was not originally allotted years of his own but received 70 years from Adam's original 1,000-year allocation. In Kabbalistic symbolism, David represents the sefirah of Malkhut, which has no light of its own but receives from the sefirot above it.

[ii] In kabbalistic symbolism, death is portrayed as feminine and associated with Samael (ס״מ), the angel of death. This gendered spiritual cosmology reflects medieval conceptions of masculine and feminine principles in the divine and demonic realms.

[iii] The author establishes a progressive spiritual process: first, a woman separates from impurity through niddah observance, then elevates spiritually through the challah offering. This creates a narrative of increasing spiritual refinement through the three commandments.

[iv] This represents a kabbalistic correspondence between the components of the lamp and the letters of the Tetragrammaton (YHVH): the vessel corresponds to the lower hei (ה), the wick to vav (ו), the oil to yod (י), and the flame to the upper hei (ה). This transforms candle-lighting into a ritual that symbolically unifies the divine name.

This is the meaning of "preparing the lamps" mentioned regarding the Menorah, for through this she prepares it to receive kindness, which is called light, so that it may shine upon her. Through these three commandments, the supernal life, which comes from 55R

And at the time of childbirth, it is impossible that they would not give a portion to the biting serpent in that place, namely the impurity of childbirth, the 60R blood, and the labor pains—all of which are a share for the external forces.[2] One who is born without such intense birth pangs has a good sign.[3] And if this attribute [of the woman] is not properly rectified to save her from these external forces that coil around 65R her heel, God forbid, they will immediately ascend

[1]This concluding statement emphasizes that proper observance of these three commandments creates a channel for divine life force to flow from the highest spiritual realms (Wisdom/Chokhmah) down to the physical world. This exemplifies the kabbalistic principle that human ritual actions affect cosmic processes.

[2]"External forces" (chitzonim) is a kabbalistic term for negative spiritual entities that derive sustenance from impurity. This passage describes childbirth as necessarily involving some spiritual impurity that feeds these forces.

[3]This suggests that easier births indicate less spiritual impurity and thus less sustenance provided to negative forces, considered a positive spiritual indication.

[i]The author draws a direct parallel between a woman's domestic candle-lighting and the priestly service of preparing the Temple Menorah, elevating this household ritual to the status of Temple service. This reflects the post-Temple Jewish approach of transforming the home into a 'small sanctuary.'

[ii]Cf. Zohar — The author cites the Zohar as an authoritative source regarding women's obligation to pray for their families during candle-lighting, establishing a connection between ritual practice and spiritual protection. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud — The author draws directly on this talmudic source that establishes these three mitzvot as particularly essential for women, with severe consequences for negligence. Ma'avar Yabok expands this with kabbalistic interpretations of why these particular commandments are spiritually significant for women. | Cf. Story of Rabbi Joshua ben Hananiah — The author uses this reference to emphasize the sensitivity and awareness of the unborn child, suggesting that a pregnant woman's actions and environments have direct spiritual impact on her child's development. | Cf. David having no life of his own — The author uses this reference to illustrate the kabbalistic concept that women, associated with the sefirah of Malkhut (which is symbolized by David), have a derivative spiritual vitality that requires connection to higher sources through proper observance of mitzvot. | Cf. Candle preparation of the Menorah — The author draws a parallel between a woman's preparation of Sabbath candles and the priestly service in the Temple, elevating the domestic ritual to the level of sacred service with cosmic significance. This suggests women should approach candle lighting with similar intention and devotion as the priests in their service.

[iii]The "biting serpent" is a kabbalistic reference to demonic forces that derive sustenance from childbirth impurity. The imagery draws on the curse to the serpent in Genesis 3:15 about striking at the heel.

[iv]"External forces that coil around her heel" refers to kabbalistic concept of negative spiritual entities (chitzonim) that attach themselves to humans, particularly at vulnerable moments. The heel imagery alludes to Genesis 3:15 where the serpent strikes at humanity's heel.

In Tikkun 17, page 26a, they said that wheat, which contains the secret of the 22 letters of the Torah, was the tree from which Adam ate,[A] but 70R he did not separate challah from it.[1] Therefore, the letter Hei did not rest in it, only Alef, which represents sin, and this caused him death.[B] Challah is the Shekhinah (Divine Presence), which includes the seven species,[2] and one must separate 75R challah from the dough. Then the letter Hei immediately rests upon that drop and gives it seed encompassing both male and female, in the secret of "behold, to you is seed." This commandment was given to women because death became the world's por- 80R tion (challah).[3] Therefore, she must separate challah from her dough, which is her seed, to restore it to humanity.

A woman must also kindle the Sabbath light with an awakening of flames of love toward her husband, 85R for the arousal of warmth on Sabbath night from his wife should be with love. This is the meaning of "when a woman conceives and bears a male child." For the bloodshed of Adam, her blood is cast

[A] Or: "wheat—which holds the mystery of the 22 letters of the Torah—was the tree from which the first man ate" — This alternate translation more explicitly renders 'אדה״ר' as 'the first man' rather than just 'Adam' and treats the mystical connection to letters as a 'mystery' rather than a 'secret,' which might better convey the kabbalistic nature of the teaching.

[B] Or: "As a result, the letter Hei did not dwell within it, only Alef, which transforms it into 'sin' (chet), and this brought death upon him" — This alternate more explicitly shows the wordplay in Hebrew between חטה (wheat) and חטא (sin) when the letter ה (Hei) is replaced with א (Alef). It also uses 'dwell' instead of 'rest' which might better convey the kabbalistic concept of divine letters inhabiting or indwelling within reality.

[1] Challah separation is the ritual removal of a portion of dough before baking bread, which is consecrated to God (originally given to priests). The text reinterprets Adam's sin as failing to perform this separation, which would have elevated the physical to the spiritual realm.

[2] This identifies the separated portion of dough (challah) with the Divine Presence (Shekhinah) and connects it to the seven species mentioned in Deuteronomy 8:8 (wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates) that were special to the Land of Israel.

[3] This passage contains wordplay between 'challah' (דough offering) and 'portion' that's difficult to convey in translation. It suggests women have special responsibility for challah separation as cosmic rectification for Eve's role in bringing death into the world.

[i] This presents an alternative kabbalistic tradition about the forbidden tree in Eden being wheat rather than the more commonly assumed apple or fig. This interpretation is found in various midrashic and kabbalistic texts.

[ii] This passage plays on the Hebrew words חטה (chitah/wheat) and חטא (chet/sin), suggesting that when the letter ה (hei, associated with the Divine Presence) is replaced with א (alef), wheat (sustenance) becomes sin (spiritual corruption).

[iii] This creates a wordplay between חלה (challah/dough offering) and חלה (chalah/portion), suggesting that because Eve brought death as the world's "portion," women must separate challah as rectification.

forth;[1] therefore, she must guard it from the blood of menstrual impurity.

And they said in Tikkun 24 that the Sabbath lamp should be placed on the right, and it is considered for a woman as if she prepared the Menorah in the south, which is Wisdom, and the table in the north, which is Understanding. The bed is between north and south, in the secret of the embrace, a preparation for union.[2] The table is the Shekhinah, coming from the north, and one must prepare her for her husband, for the Sabbath of Sabbath eve is the rectification of the Matronita (Divine Feminine).[A] The Shekhinah and Tiferet descend to her.

The three recitations of "Who sanctifies the Sabbath" that are in the evening service, along with the Kiddush over the cup, are in Malkhut. The three recitations in the morning service, along with the Maftir, contain the secret of Sabbath sanctification in Binah, where Malkhut and Tiferet ascend. The two recitations in the Musaf service derive their sanctity from the power of Keter through Yesod, which [A] Or: "the adornment of the Matronita (the Queen, Divine Feminine)" — The term 'תקוני' in kabbalistic contexts often refers to 'adornment' or 'preparation' of the Divine Feminine, especially in Sabbath contexts, where the Shekhinah is adorned like a bride. This alternative better captures the bridal imagery implicit in the kabbalistic concept.

[1] This connects menstrual blood to Adam's sin, suggesting women's monthly cycles are a form of atonement for the primordial sin. This reflects the text's integration of physical processes into a cosmic spiritual framework.

[2] The Hebrew term for 'union' here has strong mystical connotations, referring to the sexual union that mirrors divine unification of masculine and feminine attributes. The arrangement of household items is seen as creating the proper cosmic conditions for both human and divine unions.

[i] This references the Temple arrangement where the Menorah stood in the south (associated with Chokhmah/Wisdom) and the Table of Showbread in the north (associated with Binah/Understanding), establishing the home as a microcosmic Temple.

[ii] This passage refers to the kabbalistic concept that the Musaf (additional) prayer service draws down additional sanctity from Keter (Crown), the highest divine emanation, through Yesod (Foundation), which channels divine flow.

[iii] Cf. Tikkunei Zohar — This citation connects the ritual of challah separation to the rectification of Adam's sin. By not separating challah, Adam failed to elevate the physical (wheat) to the spiritual realm, leading to the separation of the divine letter Hei (representing the Divine Presence) and causing death to enter the world. | Cf. Tikkunei Zohar — This reference establishes a cosmic map where ritual objects in the home (lamp, table, bed) correspond to specific divine attributes (Wisdom/Chokhmah, Understanding/Binah) and cosmic directions, showing how proper household arrangement creates a microcosm of divine harmony that facilitates both human and divine union. | Cf. Leviticus 12:2 — The text uses this biblical reference to connect women's physical processes (menstruation, childbirth) to cosmic rectification. It suggests that proper observance of family purity laws counteracts the bloodshed associated with Adam's sin and creates spiritual protection for women. | Cf. Genesis 1:29 — The text reads this phrase from Genesis about God giving seed-bearing plants as food in kabbalistic terms of spiritual generativity. The separation of challah is seen as activating divine feminine energy (the letter Hei) which enables proper spiritual adds sanctity upon sanctity[1]—this is the secret of the Musaf prayer in every instance. And the two recitations in the Mincha service contain the secret of sanctity in Tiferet, where Malkhut ascends and Binah descends. 115R

The Saba says on page 119 that women who do not properly observe the commandments and ritual purity, or who immerse prematurely,[2] are affected by the serpent's sin which grips them and their voices like a female dog[A] that follows impurity after its kind.[3] This often causes the death of children born to them—may the Merciful One protect us. Therefore, every daughter of Israel should properly guard the gates of her purity, and any woman who frequently examines herself is praiseworthy.[B] I have repeatedly protested against those who immerse while it is still daytime, for this is not immersion at its proper time on the seventh day, and from then onward there is concern about her daughter following suit.[4] One 120R 125R 130R

[A] Or: "the sin of the primordial serpent takes hold of them and their voices like a female dog in heat" — The phrase might be referring more specifically to a female dog in heat, which would align with the text's concern about sexuality and purity. This translation captures the more explicit sexual connotation that may be present in the original.

[B] Or: "the more frequently a woman examines herself [for ritual purity], the more praiseworthy she is" — This alternative more clearly conveys the underlying rabbinic principle being adapted here—that increasing vigilance in checking for ritual purity is considered meritorious, similar to the Passover directive about searching for leaven.

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic concept that the Musaf (additional) service brings an additional level of sanctity beyond the regular prayers, mirroring how Yesod (Foundation) channels additional divine flow from higher sefirot to lower ones.

[2] The text is addressing the Jewish laws of niddah (menstrual purity), which require women to immerse in a mikveh (ritual bath) seven days after their menstruation ends. The author is criticizing women who don't follow these laws precisely or who immerse before nightfall on the seventh day.

[3] This harsh metaphor reflects medieval attitudes about ritual impurity. The comparison to a dog draws on negative symbolism in Jewish tradition where dogs were often considered impure animals.

[4] The Hebrew phrase 'serach bitah' refers to the concern that a daughter will learn improper practices from her mother, perpetuating ritual errors across generations.

generation and union of masculine and feminine principles. | Cf. Zohar — This parallel draws on classic Zoharic teachings about how the different prayer services of Shabbat create a progressive spiritual ascent through the sefirot. The passage shows how prayers create pathways for the Shekhinah (Malkhut) to ascend and unite with higher divine attributes throughout the Sabbath day.

[i] The author refers to the Saba (the Elder), which is a reference to a section of the Zohar known as Saba d'Mishpatim. This text is emphasizing the importance of women's ritual purity laws, particularly regarding the timing of immersion in the mikveh (ritual bath) after menstruation.

[ii] This is a kabbalistic reference to the primordial sin of the serpent (nachash) in the Garden of Eden. The text uses the metaphor of a female dog (kalbeta in Aramaic) to describe how this ancient sin attaches to women who don't properly observe purification rituals.

[iii] This phrase refers to the practice of women examining themselves for signs of menstrual blood to determine their ritual status. The Hebrew uses a play on a Talmudic saying about Passover examination (kol hayad hamarbeh livdok et hechametz meshubachat).

must always wait until evening when there is no obvious necessity otherwise.

The Saba says that because of this sin, people perish without understanding. Woe to the wicked women who cause this harm to themselves, their husbands, and their children. Many things depend on what a woman encounters when ascending from the ritual bath—as she encounters, so will her children be, as written in the books of the sages. This is why Rabbi Yochanan would sit at the gates of the ritual bath.[1] There was an incident involving Elisha the High Priest whose children did not survive because his wife was not careful about whom she encountered when leaving the ritual bath, until she encountered Metatron, the Prince of the Divine Presence.[2] She then had marital relations with her husband in joy and conceived Rabbi Ishmael the High Priest, whose appearance resembled him [Metatron].[3] When a woman immerses early, there is greater concern that she will encounter improper things, for "there is a time and season for everything under heaven."

One who encounters a woman ascending from the ritual bath should say: "He pours contempt upon nobles and makes them wander in pathless wastes." The womb of an evil woman is delivered to Samael,[4] and through this he is driven away from the womb of a good woman. Because they stole from [1] This anecdote about Rabbi Yochanan doesn't appear in the Talmud but is found in kabbalistic literature. It demonstrates a belief that the environment and encounters immediately after ritual immersion were spiritually significant.

[2] In Jewish mysticism, encountering angels could have profound spiritual effects. This story suggests that meeting Metatron—one of the highest angels—immediately after ritual immersion resulted in the conception of a child with special spiritual qualities.

[3] The text suggests that Rabbi Ishmael the High Priest physically resembled the angel Metatron, implying that an encounter with angels could influence the physical characteristics of children conceived afterward.

[4] In Jewish mysticism, Samael is often identified as the angel of death or the chief of evil spirits. This passage suggests that women who don't observe purity laws properly place their reproductive capacity under the influence of negative spiritual forces.

[i] The phrase 'mitabdei bnei alma belo da'ata' is Aramaic, referring to people perishing without understanding or awareness of the spiritual consequences of their actions.

[ii] This refers to a rabbinic story about Rabbi Yochanan sitting at the entrance to the ritual bath. The story demonstrates the importance ancient sages placed on the encounters women had immediately after immersion, believing these encounters could influence the nature of children conceived afterwards.

[iii] Metatron is one of the highest angels in Jewish mysticism, sometimes described as the 'Prince of the Divine Presence' (Sar HaPanim). The text suggests a mystical encounter between Elisha the High Priest's wife and this angel, resulting in the birth of Rabbi Ishmael who resembled the angel.

[A] Or: “judgment is executed upon him” — This passive construction more accurately reflects the original Aramaic phrasing, which indicates that judgment happens to the infant rather than the infant executing judgment.

[1] This cryptic passage refers to complex kabbalistic ideas about how proper ritual observance by women ‘steals’ power from negative spiritual forces, thereby redirecting divine blessings from evil to good.

[2] This poignant passage imagines the souls of children who died in infancy questioning their fate. It reflects theological wrestling with the problem of innocent suffering.

[3] This represents the Jewish mystical belief that children who die young have a special elevated status in the spiritual realms, higher even than fully righteous adults. This concept offered comfort to parents who lost children.

[i] S”M is an abbreviation for Samael, the angel of death in Jewish mysticism. The passage uses kabbalistic imagery to explain how evil spiritual forces can affect women’s wombs, and how proper ritual observance pushes these forces away from righteous women.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase affirms that all divine judgments are true and just. ‘Dinim d’keshot’ means judgments of truth.

[iii] This references the complex theological question of why infants die, suggesting that even day-old infants may have sinned in some mystical sense. This reflects certain kabbalistic views about pre-existence of souls.

[iv] This is a quote from Psalms 2:7, “Today I have begotten you,” which the text applies to infants who die young, suggesting they have a special relationship with God.

[v] This quote from Psalms 8:3 (“From the mouths of babes and sucklings You have established strength because of Your adversaries”) is used to support the idea that deceased infants have a special spiritual power.

If they were wise, they would understand this; they would discern their latter end.[A] Those who visit the sick in their illness should encourage the living one to praise and supplicate with his own mouth to his King, and a father should make known to his children and accustom him to entreat God with words from the verses of Scripture, for behold, the Lord stands upon the wall of Scripture[2] as [A] Or: "If they were wise, they would comprehend this and understand their ultimate purpose" — This alternative captures the philosophical dimension of the verse, emphasizing that understanding one's mortality leads to deeper existential awareness rather than merely foreseeing future events.

[1] This refers to the Talmudic concept that during periods of strict divine judgment, even failing to perform positive commandments (not just violating prohibitions) can result in punishment. This concept was extended to dangerous situations like warfare.

[2] The author creates a powerful image combining the prophetic vision in Amos 7:7 (where God stands on a wall with a measuring line) with the idea of Scripture itself forming a protective wall around the ill person.

[i] This refers to the Talmudic concept that in times of divine anger or judgment, people may be punished even for failing to perform positive commandments (which normally don't carry punishment), not just for violating prohibitions.

[ii] Cf. Zohar, Saba d'Mishpatim — The author is directly drawing on this mystical text to establish the spiritual importance of proper ritual immersion timing for women. The Zohar is the central text of Jewish mysticism, so this reference establishes the mystical framework for understanding women's purity practices. | Cf. Niddah laws in the Talmud — While not directly quoting specific Talmudic passages, the text is clearly engaging with and expanding upon Talmudic discussions about women's ritual purity. The author adds kabbalistic interpretations to these halakhic requirements, showing how ritual timing connects to cosmic spiritual forces. | Cf. Psalms 8:3 — The author reinterprets this psalm, which originally praised God for giving even children the ability to recognize divine greatness, to suggest that the souls of deceased infants have special spiritual power to silence accusers and provide protection for the living. | Cf. Psalms 2:7 — The psalm originally referred to God's relationship with the king of Israel, but here it's reinterpreted to suggest that God has a special parental relationship with infants who die young, claiming them as divine children. | Cf. Midrash on Elisha the High Priest — This narrative element connects to a broader Jewish mystical tradition about how encounters immediately after ritual immersion can influence conception. The specific story doesn't appear in canonical rabbinic literature in precisely this form, suggesting the author may be drawing on oral traditions or lesser-known mystical texts. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 3:1 — This biblical allusion reinforces the text's emphasis on proper timing for ritual immersion. By invoking Ecclesiastes, the author suggests that ritual timing is part of the divine cosmic order, not merely a technical religious requirement.

[iii] This is a wordplay on the acronym אנ״ך (Scripture: Torah, Prophets, and Writings) and Amos 7:7 where God stands on a wall with a plumb line (אנך). The author suggests that Scripture itself serves as a protective wall.

[1] The number 36 has mystical significance in Jewish tradition, often associated with the thirty-six righteous individuals (lamed vav tzadikim) who sustain the world. Here it likely refers to specific collections of verses arranged for healing purposes.

[2] This suggests both physical recovery (being well enough to visit the synagogue) and spiritual

[i] The author is explaining that while some actions might normally be prohibited, seeking protection through Scripture during illness is permitted and even encouraged.

[ii] The author is referencing the collection of verses he has compiled—36 in each category—which he compares to rivers of honey, milk, and butter, biblical metaphors for abundance and spiritual sustenance.

[iii] This echoes Hosea 6:2, 'After two days He will revive us; on the third day He will raise us up.' It suggests that proper use of these scriptural verses will lead to recovery by the third day, allowing one to go to the Temple/synagogue.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage builds on the earlier framework by providing practical guidance for those who visit the sick, encouraging them to guide patients in reciting healing biblical verses. | Cf. Zohar — The author draws on kabbalistic concepts about the power of sacred words to create spiritual protections and healing channels for the ill person through proper recitation of Scripture. | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:29 — By opening with this verse, the author suggests that proper understanding of Scripture's healing power is a form of wisdom that leads to better outcomes in times of illness. | Cf. Amos 7:7 — The author cleverly repurposes this image to suggest that

One who seeks mercy from the Master of Compassion[1] should accustom their tongue to speak clearly through six verses from the Torah, twelve from the Prophets, and eighteen from the Writings. For the receiver is always smaller than what is needed to contain all the abundance of the giver, until they prepare themselves from below to above, sometimes with twice the spiritual power and sometimes with less than twice. The common denominator is that the power of the receiver will never equal that of the giver. The spirituality of Torah verses, which are spoken through the brightly illuminating lens,[2] are so potent at their source that they require twelve verses from the Prophets to clothe the spirituality that extends from them, for these are the two prophets of truth who receive the illumination of Tiferet, the Written Torah,[3] upon themselves. However, the spirituality of the prophetic verses becomes clothed and illuminated in verses spoken through the Holy Spirit, with a third part more elevation. The 'third day' motif appears throughout biblical literature as a time of transformation and deliverance.

[A] Or: "and you will be strong as cast metal and not fear" — The term 'מוצק' can refer to metal that has been cast or poured, suggesting a transformation from liquid to solid state. This alternative captures the metallurgical metaphor that might be intended, implying a transformation from weakness to strength.

[1] The Hebrew term 'baal ha-chasadim' literally means 'master of kindnesses' and refers to God as the source of all compassionate acts.

[2] This refers to the Talmudic concept of 'aspaklaria ha-me'irah,' the clear prophetic vision attributed to Moses, contrasted with the 'dim lens' through which other prophets perceived divine truth.

[3] In kabbalistic thought, the sefirah of Tiferet (Beauty/Harmony) is associated with the Written Torah, while Malkhut is associated with the Oral Torah.

Scripture itself (אנ״ך/TaNaKh) forms a protective wall around the ill, with God standing upon it as defender. | Cf. Priestly Blessing (Numbers 6:24-26) — The author incorporates elements of this blessing to suggest that proper use of scriptural verses during illness invokes the same divine protection and favor as the priestly blessing.

[i] This expresses the kabbalistic concept that the receiver (human soul or lower spiritual entity) has limited capacity compared to the divine abundance that flows from above.

[ii] The term "illuminating lens" (aspaklaria ha-me'irah) refers to the highest level of prophetic vision, traditionally attributed to Moses, who saw through a clear lens as opposed to other prophets who saw through a dim lens.

[iii] "Two prophets of truth" is an Aramaic phrase that typically refers to Moses and Aaron or, in kabbalistic thought, to the sefirot of Netzach and Hod, which channel prophetic influx.

[iv] This refers to the kabbalistic understanding that the Written Torah emanates from the sefirah of Tiferet (abbreviated as ת״ת), which represents harmony and truth in the divine emanation system.

[1]The original contains a wordplay on the book's title 'Ma'avar Yabok,' suggesting that the negative forces will be 'emptied out' (yabbok from the root b-k-k) through proper spiritual practice.
[2]This number has significant mystical meaning in Judaism. It represents twice 18 (chai, meaning 'life') and is associated with the 36 righteous individuals who sustain the world in each generation.
[3]This refers to the kabbalistic concept of three interconnected dimensions: space (olam), time (shanah), and soul (nefesh), which form a matrix of divine manifestation in creation.
[4]In Kabbalah, these represent different aspects of Chokhmah (Wisdom): the higher, concealed aspect that is barely perceptible even to mystics, and the lower aspect that can be accessed through spiritual practice.

[vi]Cf. Zohar — The author draws on Zoharic concepts of the spiritual power of biblical verses and their hierarchical arrangement, where Torah verses have the highest potency, followed by Prophetic texts and then Writings. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 1:7 — The passage alludes to this concept when discussing how the receiver cannot fully contain the giver's abundance, similar to how the rivers continually flow into the sea without filling it. | Cf. Isaiah 40:12 — The text references this verse when mentioning 'the third part' of earth's dust, using it to illustrate the concept of divine measurement and proportion in spiritual influence. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 11:3 — The author directly quotes this verse to illustrate how divine abundance flows downward through spiritual channels, just as rain falls from clouds when they are full. | Cf. Psalm 29:7 — This quote is used to explain how prayer (the human voice directed toward God) has the power to transform and redirect the negative 'flames' affecting the sick person. | Cf. Isaiah 38:19 — The text alludes to this verse from Hezekiah's thanksgiving after healing, reinforcing the connection between life, healing, and praise

The integrity of the upright guides them in glory and splendor to reveal to humanity their righteousness. So that they may delight in the radiant glory of these words of my discourse, and recline in their pathways among rivers and streams of honey and butter, and have conversation and discourse on essential matters worthy to be before the congregation of the upright—namely, the members of the charitable society, the esteemed priests who are emissaries of the Merciful One—as a remembrance. My spirit will give them rest as I meditate before them with a clear and refined spirit and language, and with perfect writing including its vowel points and cantillation marks, in order to fulfill their desire. Their eyes will not wander here and there, and thus their path will be straight before their eyes. The righteous will enter it and from the labor of their souls they will be satisfied[2] with abundant joy for length of days, for they will bring forth salvation to the yearning soul, and the Most High God will seek it out and light will shine upon it. The hungry soul they will fill with goodness, and his God will be with him and he will ascend. Therefore, the satisfaction of their table will be filled with abundance in the sweetness of honey, for their words are pleasant, and they will dwell in the land and feed on faithfulness with love and brotherhood for length of days. And in both worlds,[3] the Lord their God will favor them and save them, for

[1] The term ‘seder’ (plural ‘sedarim’) in this context refers to a structured arrangement of prayers, psalms, and biblical verses organized for specific ritual purposes. These eight orders provide different liturgical sequences for healing the sick, comforting the dying, and guiding those attending to them. Each ‘seder’ represents a complete liturgical unit appropriate for different situations or stages of illness.

[2] This refers to the spiritual rewards that those who perform the sacred duty of caring for the dying and deceased will receive. The author consistently emphasizes throughout Ma’avar Yabok that those who properly perform these rituals earn divine merit and protection.

[3] The Hebrew phrase ‘בשני העולמות’ (in both worlds) refers to this world (olam hazeh) and the World to Come (olam haba), reflecting the Jewish belief in rewards both in this life and after death. This dual focus is central to Ma’avar Yabok’s approach to end-of-life care.

of God, which is central to Ma’avar Yabok’s approach to illness. | Cf. Psalm 145:21 — The passage concludes with this verse, emphasizing the universal praise of God that results from healing and divine mercy, connecting personal healing to cosmic harmony.

[i] This short line is a subheading that introduces the ‘Seder’ section of Ma’avar Yabok, which contains eight distinct liturgical sequences or ‘orders’ of prayers, psalms, and verses to be recited for the sick and dying. The term ‘seder’ (order/arrangement) indicates a structured compilation of liturgical elements arranged for specific ritual purposes.

The Midrash on Psalms teaches: When a person is ill for one day, what should they do? They need prayer. The same applies on the second day and the third day. On the fourth day, what should they do? They should declare, "I am in pain." The Holy One, blessed be He, then says, "Now I will support and restore him." This is the meaning of "You have turned his entire bed in his illness." All the sins that one committed while standing on their feet, the Holy One turns around through their illness.[2] Therefore, one who sets their ways properly[A] will see God's salvation. And they said in the Sanhedrin: Anyone who strengthens themselves in prayer below will have no adversaries above, as it is said, "Will your cry arrange itself when there is no distress? Then Shaddai will be among your gold." Then silver and longing—the attribute of kindness—will be treasures

[A] Or: "one who orders their path correctly" — This Aramaic expression could be rendered more literally to preserve the path metaphor, which connects to the theme of spiritual journey central to Ma'avar Yabok.

[1] This unusual phrase draws on Isaiah 29:4, which uses the image of a voice speaking from the dust. The author employs this self-deprecating metaphor to present himself humbly while still asserting the value of his teachings.

[2] This presents illness as a means of atonement—not merely punishment but a transformative process that can convert past sins into merit through proper spiritual response. This redemptive view of suffering is central to the book's approach to end-of-life care.

[i] Cf. Proverbs 11:3 — The author begins with an allusion to this biblical verse to emphasize the spiritual guidance that righteousness provides, setting the tone for a text that will offer spiritual guidance for the dying. | Cf. Job 20:17 — This biblical imagery is repurposed to describe the spiritual nourishment that readers will receive from the book's teachings about death and the afterlife. | Cf. Traditional Jewish blessing formulas — The author uses traditional blessing formulas to close this introductory section, establishing the religious authority of the text while invoking divine blessing on its readers.

[ii] The text presents a structured progression of illness over four days, showing that divine intervention typically occurs on the fourth day. This follows a pattern found in other rabbinic literature where significant spiritual transformations occur after three-day periods.

[iii] This is a quote from Psalms 41:4. The midrash interprets 'turning his bed' metaphorically to mean that God transforms the person's sins through their illness, making illness a form of atonement.

[iv] This is a quote from Job 36:19 that is creatively interpreted through wordplay. The original meaning refers to distress and riches, but the author reinterprets it to suggest that prayer eliminates adversaries (צרים) and brings divine protection.

for you.[A] Thus, "A man's spirit can sustain him in sickness," but "a broken spirit, who can bear it?" In this way, sickness of the soul is greater than sickness of the body,[1] for when the body is sick, the soul can endure and strengthen itself to bear it, but when the soul is sick, the body cannot endure its distress nor sustain it, and it becomes like a melting standard.[B]

Furthermore, the wise king taught us in this verse that the evil inclination in a person's heart causes them to nourish and sustain the very things that make them ill, as they follow their desires. The root of all sickness is worry about worldly matters,[2] for it causes "burning of the bones," as it is written, "A broken spirit dries the bones." The sages said that worry is a sickness of the soul, and one who constantly worries falls into terrible illnesses, as our rabbis stated in chapter "The Seer," in chapter "Even Though," and in chapter "Portion" in the words of Ben Sira. And they said, "There is no wisdom with worry." Just as we are beautiful in good times, so should we be beautiful in suffering.[3]

They also said in the Midrash on Psalms: "And You, O Lord, are exalted forever." Forever Your hand is supreme—for good, "Blessed is the Good who does good"; for evil, "Blessed is the True Judge." Therefore we entreat our Judge that the Merciful Father, the Healer, show His goodness and kindness, and let the crushed bones rejoice. May He send His good word and heal the sickness of His people, for there is none besides Him. And it seems to me that for [A] Or: "silver and the yearning quality of loving-kindness will be abundant treasures for you" — This alternate translation makes clearer that 'longing' (בוסף) is being presented as a characteristic of the divine attribute of Chesed (loving-kindness), and 'toa'fot' specifically implies abundant treasures.

[B] Or: "it becomes like a dissolving banner" — This biblical allusion (likely to Isaiah 10:18) uses the image of a flag or banner (נס/nes) that is wasting away, which might be clearer with this alternate translation.

[1] The author establishes a hierarchy of suffering where spiritual distress is considered more severe than physical pain, because the soul can strengthen itself to endure physical illness, but the body lacks the capacity to support spiritual suffering.

[2] This reflects a psychosomatic understanding of illness that was advanced for its time, recognizing how mental states (particularly anxiety) can manifest as physical ailments.

[3] This phrase reflects the Jewish concept of accepting both good and bad with equanimity, suggesting that one should maintain dignity and spiritual composure even during suffering.

[i] A quote from Proverbs 18:14, used to establish the comparison between physical and spiritual illness. The author argues that spiritual illness is worse because while the soul can support a sick body, the body cannot sustain a sick soul.

[ii] The author presents an important psychological insight that worldly worries are the root cause of many physical ailments, anticipating modern understandings of psychosomatic illness.

With trumpets of alarm, I have prepared in my poverty these verses for every wise and simple person. Behold, they are special verses uniquely suited to illuminate the countenance of the Supreme Will[2] for every type of ailment, disease, sickness, and mal- 95R
ady. For God's mercy precedes their hidden inner meaning, and even their plain meaning will free the prisoner. He will send His word and heal them, and His angel will save them through His love and compassion. Please understand them and live, and your 100R soul will delight in abundance. The intention of their number and arrangement appears at the beginning of the book in the discourse "Lips of Righteousness," chapter 6—seek it there and live!

[1] This phrase (אין עוד מלבדו) from Deuteronomy 4:35 is presented as a specific healing formula. This reflects the kabbalistic practice of using divine names and biblical phrases as protective or healing invocations.

[2] The author presents a mystical understanding of biblical verses as channels for divine healing energy. The metaphor of 'illuminating the countenance' suggests that these verses activate divine favor (the 'shining face' of God referenced in the priestly blessing).

[i] This refers to a story about Rabbi Chanila who prescribed reciting the formula 'There is none besides Him' (אין עוד מלבדו) as a healing remedy. The quotation marks in the Hebrew indicate acronyms or special emphasis on these words as a formula to be recited.

[ii] The author refers readers to another section of his own book 'Ma'avar Yabok' titled 'Siftei Tzedek' (Lips of Righteousness), chapter 6, which apparently contains detailed explanations of healing verses and their arrangements.

[iii] Cf. Midrash Tehillim — The text draws on this midrash to establish the progressive nature of illness and divine response, showing how illness can serve as atonement for sins and how God ultimately provides support on the fourth day of illness. | Cf. Tractate Sanhedrin — This reference establishes the protective power of sincere prayer, suggesting that one who prays with full effort will be protected from spiritual accusers in the heavenly court. | Cf. Proverbs 18:14 — The author uses this verse as the foundation for comparing physical and spiritual illness, arguing that spiritual affliction is more severe because while the soul can support a sick body, the body cannot support a sick soul. | Cf. Berakhot — The author refers to this section to establish rabbinic precedent for the harmful effects of worry on health, supporting his argument that psychological states directly impact physical wellbeing. | Cf. Ben Sira — This reference to Ben Sira's wisdom reinforces the connection between worry and illness, drawing on non-canonical but respected Jewish wisdom literature. | Cf. Psalm 68:14 — The author reinterprets this verse through wordplay to suggest that sincere prayer turns potential adversaries (צרים) into treasures (בצריך), showing how prayer transforms negative circumstances into spiritual wealth. | Cf. Siftei Tzedek — The author refers readers to this earlier section of his own work for the detailed explanation of the biblical verses that should be recited for healing various illnesses.

[A] Or: "Before commencing any of these prayer sequences, one should recite the following" — This alternate translation captures the liturgical context more clearly, specifying that these are prayer sequences rather than just 'orders,' and using 'recite' instead of 'say' better reflects the formal religious nature of the instruction.

[B] Or: "three times" — The abbreviation ג״פ (gimmel-peh) stands for 'three times' (pa'amim shalosh). While the bracketed notation is accurate, spelling it out would be clearer for readers unfamiliar with Hebrew abbreviations.

[C] Or: "Like a swift or a swallow, so do I chirp" — The Hebrew terms 'sus' and 'agur' have been variously translated. While 'horse' is one translation of 'sus', in this context from Isaiah 38:14, many scholars believe it refers to 'swift' (a type of bird). Similarly, 'agur' is sometimes translated as 'crane' but also as 'swallow'. Bird imagery makes more contextual sense with the chirping.

[D] Or: "I am oppressed, be my guarantor" — The Hebrew 'arveni' (עָרְבֵנִי) literally means 'be my guarantor' or 'stand surety for me'. Both translations are accurate, but 'guarantor' might be more immediately understandable to modern readers.

[1] This biblical passage is frequently cited in Jewish sources discussing why recovery from illness is desirable—not merely for the person's physical wellbeing, but because the living have the unique privilege of praising God and studying Torah, activities unavailable to the dead according to this worldview.

[2] This phrase suggests that recovery from illness would result in continued worship at the Temple (or synagogue in post-Temple times). It reflects the book's perspective that proper spiritual care during illness focuses on both potential outcomes: recovery with renewed commitment to divine service, or a spiritually prepared transition to death.

[i] This is a liturgical instruction (rubric) at the beginning of the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok, indicating that each of the eight prayer arrangements should begin with the formula that follows this instruction.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This line serves as a liturgical instruction indicating that each of the eight prayer sequences that follow should be preceded by a specific opening formula. Such rubrics were common in Jewish prayer books to ensure proper ritual practice. | Cf. Siddur (Jewish prayer book) — This instructional text follows the format commonly found in Jewish prayer books, where rubrics in Hebrew indicate the proper order and procedure for prayer sequences.

[iii] The Hebrew instruction "ג״פ" (gimmel-peh) indicates that the phrase "Please, O LORD, save us" should be recited three times. This repetition is common in Jewish liturgy for particularly important supplications.

[iv] This is a direct quote from Isaiah 38:14, part of King Hezekiah's prayer when he was deathly ill. The specific bird types mentioned have been variously translated, but the imagery conveys the desperate, repetitive sounds of someone in distress.

[v] This reflects the traditional Jewish concept that divine praise is primarily performed by the living, not the dead. In the context of prayers for healing, it suggests that recovery would allow continued service to God, a core theme in Ma'avar Yabok.

אַל־תִּרְחַק מִמֶּנִּי: חוּשָׁה לְעֶזְרָתִי יְיָ תְּשׁוּעָתִי: [i]

But I have trusted in Your mercy; my heart shall 125R 130R

[A] Or: "How long must I devise strategies within myself" — This alternate translation emphasizes the active, repetitive mental struggle of the ill person trying to find solutions to their suffering, which might better convey the psychological dimension of illness that Ma'avar Yabok addresses.

[B] Or: "Look upon me and answer me, O LORD my God" — This translation more directly captures the visual metaphor in הַבִּיטָה (literally "look") which contrasts with God "hiding His face" mentioned earlier, emphasizing the sick person's desire to be seen by God in their suffering.

[1] The Hebrew uses the third-person masculine singular imperfect verb 'יאמר' (yomar), which could be translated as 'he should say' or 'one should recite.' In the context of a liturgical manual, this is a directive to whoever is performing the ritual.

[2] These psalm numbers refer to specific psalms that would be appropriate for situations of illness or approaching death. Psalm 13 is a plea for divine help during suffering, Psalm 15 describes who may dwell with God, Psalm 16 expresses confidence in God's protection even in death, and Psalm 17 is a prayer for divine protection against enemies.

[i] Cf. Psalms 39:12 — This verse expresses the supplicant's sense of transience and mortality, a fitting sentiment for Ma'avar Yabok as it deals with end-of-life transitions. The reference emphasizes the petitioner's vulnerable position before God. | Cf. Isaiah 38:14 — This passage is drawn from King Hezekiah's prayer when he was deathly ill, making it particularly appropriate for Ma'avar Yabok's focus on prayers for the sick and dying. The imagery of birds expressing distress symbolizes the human cry of pain and supplication. | Cf. Isaiah 38:18-19 — This verse from Hezekiah's prayer reflects the traditional Jewish view that divine praise is primarily the domain of the living. It subtly suggests urgency in healing the sick, as recovery would allow continued service to God, a theme emphasized throughout Ma'avar Yabok. | Cf. Psalm 38:21-22 — This concluding plea from Psalm 38 is particularly relevant in the context of illness or approaching death. The psalmist, who describes intense suffering throughout the psalm, ends with this direct appeal for divine presence and swift help.

[ii] This is an instruction within the "Seder" (ordered arrangement) section of Ma'avar Yabok, directing the reader to select one of four specific psalms to recite when visiting the sick or attending to the dying. The term 'סימן' (siman) refers to the chapter number of the psalm in the biblical Book of Psalms.

[iii] The repetition of "how long" (עַד־אָנָה) four times in the opening verses creates a rhythmic lament that expresses the sick person's feeling of abandonment and impatience for divine intervention. This rhetorical device was considered particularly powerful in healing prayers.

[iv] The Hebrew phrase uses "sleep the sleep of death" as a euphemism. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this takes on special significance as a prayer against dying unprepared or without divine reconciliation.

(Psalm 15) A Psalm of David. LORD, who may dwell in Your tent?[2] Who may abide on Your holy mountain? One who walks uprightly, and does what is right, and speaks truth in his heart.[3] Who has not slandered with his tongue, has not done harm to his fellow, nor cast disgrace upon his relative. In whose eyes a contemptible person is despised,[A] but who honors those who fear the LORD; who swears to his own detriment and does not change.[4] Who has not lent his money with interest,[B] nor taken a bribe against the innocent. One who does these things

[A] Or: "In whose eyes a vile person is despised" — The Hebrew term 'nivzeh' can be rendered as 'vile' which might better capture the moral judgment implied in the original, though 'contemptible' maintains the formal register appropriate for this translation.

[B] Or: "has not given with usury" — The term 'neshekh' literally means 'bite' and is sometimes translated as 'usury' rather than 'interest' to emphasize its exploitative nature. However, 'interest' is more immediately understandable to modern readers.

[1] The Hebrew גָּמַל עָלָי could also be translated as "rewarded me" or "bestowed good upon me." The psalm concludes with an expression of hope and gratitude that would be recited even by the seriously ill, affirming faith in divine goodness despite present suffering.

[2] The Hebrew 'mi-yagur be'ohalekha' uses imagery of temporary dwelling (tent) that would resonate with the sick person contemplating the temporary nature of physical existence.

[3] The internal dimension of truth-speaking is emphasized here, suggesting that genuine ethical conduct begins with internal honesty. This aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on genuine confession and self-examination before death.

[4] This refers to keeping one's word even when it becomes disadvantageous—a particularly significant virtue in Jewish tradition regarding deathbed promises and ethical wills.

[i] Cf. Talmud Bavli, Berakhot 7b — This psalm is understood in rabbinic tradition as David's prayer during a time of spiritual and physical crisis. Ma'avar Yabok includes it specifically to give voice to the sick person's feelings of abandonment during illness while maintaining hope in divine mercy. | Cf. Zohar II 218b — In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this psalm gives expression to the sick person's experience of divine concealment, which kabbalistic tradition understands as a necessary phase before healing or peaceful transition. The repeated 'how long' questions mirror the soul's longing for divine reconnection.

[ii] This question about dwelling on God's holy mountain has special resonance in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, as it evokes the soul's journey to divine realms after death. The psalm functions as both a moral examination for the ill person and a meditation on the spiritual prerequisites for the soul's ascent.

[iii] The prohibition against lending with interest appears frequently in burial society (chevra kadisha) ethical codes, as they often functioned as interest-free loan societies. This reinforces Ma'avar Yabok's connection to these societies who would recite these prayers.

[iv] The Hebrew 'lo yimot le'olam' (shall never be shaken) can be read as a promise of spiritual stability beyond death. In the context of prayers for the ill, this offers reassurance that ethical conduct provides lasting spiritual security.

[v] Cf. Psalm 24 — Both psalms describe ethical qualifications for proximity to God. This connection is especially relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context, as these qualifications may represent the spiritual preparation needed for the soul's final journey. | Cf. Zohar — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok likely draws on kabbalistic interpretations where the ethical qualities described serve as 'passport credentials' for the soul entering heavenly realms. | Cf. Talmud — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm represents a moral summation that prepares the sick or dying person by focusing on essential ethical conduct rather than complex ritual details.

[A] Or: "I said to the LORD, "You are my Lord; I have no good beyond You."" — This alternate translation captures another widely accepted interpretation of this difficult verse, suggesting that the psalmist finds all good in God alone, rather than expressing that God has no obligation toward the psalmist. This reading emphasizes the sufficiency of God rather than divine grace.

[B] Or: "As for the saints who are in the land, they are the excellent ones in whom is all my delight." — This translation uses terms more familiar in religious contexts ('saints' rather than 'holy ones' and 'excellent ones' rather than 'noble ones'). It also specifies 'the land' which might suggest the promised land of Israel rather than earth generally, which could better reflect the original context.

[C] Or: "Many are the sorrows of those who pursue another god" — This simpler rendering avoids some of the syntactical complexity of the Hebrew while preserving the essential meaning. It may be more accessible to modern readers while still accurately conveying the contrast between worshipping the true God and following idols.

[D] Or: "even my body rests in safety" — This alternate translation might better convey the

[1] The "boundary lines" refer to how land was distributed by lot in ancient Israel, using measuring lines to mark property boundaries. The psalmist uses this as a metaphor for his spiritual inheritance, suggesting that God has given him a favorable portion in life.

[2] In biblical Hebrew, "glory" (כָּבוֹד) can refer to one's innermost self or soul, representing the seat of emotions and honor. Some traditions understand this as referring to the tongue or faculty of speech, suggesting that the psalmist praises God verbally.

[i] The term "miktam" (מִכְתָּם) is a technical musical or liturgical term whose exact meaning is uncertain. It appears in the titles of Psalms 16, 56-60. Some scholars suggest it refers to an inscription or a golden psalm, while others connect it to the verb meaning "to cover" or "to hide," possibly suggesting a hidden or secret teaching.

[ii] This verse has challenging syntax in the Hebrew. It could refer to the righteous people in the land whom the psalmist admires, or possibly to other divine beings ("holy ones") whom the psalmist acknowledges without worshipping.

[iii] This is one of the more difficult verses to translate in this psalm. The Hebrew syntax is compressed and potentially ambiguous, with several possible interpretations about who is being referred to and what action is being described.

[iv] The Hebrew term "כְּבוֹדִי" (my glory) likely refers to the psalmist's soul or innermost self, though some translations render it as "tongue" based on similar usage elsewhere in Psalms.

[v] This verse is quoted in Acts 2:27 and 13:35 in the New Testament as a messianic prophecy referring to Christ's resurrection, though in its original context it may express confidence in divine protection from premature death.

(Psalm 17) A prayer of David.[1] Hear, O LORD, righteousness, attend to my cry, give ear to my prayer from lips without deceit. You have examined my heart, You have 170R visited me in the night, You have tested me and found nothing; my thoughts do not transgress my mouth. I have called upon You, for You will answer me, O God; incline Your ear sense of complete physical security and peace that the psalmist feels. The term 'rests' connotes the peaceful confidence more clearly than 'dwells' for contemporary readers, while 'safety' may be more immediately understood than 'securely.'

[A] Or: "For You will not abandon me to the grave, nor let Your faithful one experience decay." — This translation avoids the potentially unfamiliar term 'Sheol' and captures the possible implications about bodily corruption or decay that are present in the Hebrew 'שָׁחַת' (shachat). This reading aligns with how the verse was later interpreted in Jewish and Christian traditions regarding resurrection.

[1] This psalm is specifically labeled as a prayer (tefillah) rather than a song, giving it a particularly supplicatory nature that made it appropriate for those who are ill or in distress.

[i] Cf. Psalm 17:8 — Both psalms open with similar petitions for divine protection, using different metaphorical language but expressing the same core trust in God's protective care. | Cf. Psalm 73:25-26 — Both psalms express the idea that God himself, rather than material benefits or other gods, is the psalmist's chosen portion and inheritance. This reflects the profound theological concept that relationship with God is the ultimate good. | Cf. Acts 2:25-28 — While not part of the original context, this later interpretation in the New Testament shows how Psalm 16 came to be understood messianically in early Christian tradition, particularly the references to not seeing corruption and the path of life. | Cf. Lamentations 3:24 — Both texts express the theological concept of God himself being one's inheritance or portion, a spiritual understanding of divine relationship that transcends material possessions or temporary circumstances. | Cf. Numbers 18:20 — Psalm 16:5's description of the LORD as 'my portion and my cup' echoes the language used about the Levitical priesthood, who had no land inheritance but instead had God as their portion. The psalmist adopts this priestly language to express complete dependence on and satisfaction with God.

[ii] This psalm is identified as a 'tefillah' (prayer) rather than a 'mizmor' (psalm), indicating its particularly supplicatory nature. It appears in Ma'avar Yabok as one of several psalms specifically recommended for recitation by or for the sick.

[iii] The term 'rinnati' (my cry) derives from a root suggesting joyful singing, but in this context refers to an intense, emotional plea—highlighting the psalmist's passionate appeal to God in a time of distress.

[iv] The phrase 'without deceitful lips' establishes the psalm's theme of innocence and integrity, which would resonate with the sick person seeking to present themselves honestly before God prior to potential death.

[v] The reference to God visiting or examining the psalmist at night has particular significance in Ma'avar Yabok's context, as nighttime was considered especially dangerous for the ill, when the Angel of Death was thought to be most active.

[1] This evocative phrase translates the Hebrew ‘ishon bat-ayin,’ literally ‘the little man of the daughter of the eye,’ referring to the pupil where one can see a tiny reflection of oneself. It’s an ancient metaphor for something precious and carefully protected.

[2] This protective imagery appears frequently in psalms and was especially meaningful in the context of Ma’avar Yabok, where being ‘under the wings of the Divine Presence’ symbolized spiritual protection during illness and at the moment of death.

[3] The Hebrew ‘chelbamo sagru’ literally refers to ‘closing their fat,’ with ‘fat’ symbolizing insensitivity or callousness. The image suggests enemies who have become morally numb and incapable of compassion.

[4] This passage contrasts worldly people who find their satisfaction in material wealth and offspring with the psalmist, who seeks divine presence. In the context of Ma’avar Yabok, this reinforces the spiritual focus needed when facing illness and mortality.

[1] This final verse was particularly significant in the context of Ma’avar Yabok’s focus on death and the afterlife. While it literally refers to awakening from sleep, Jewish tradition often interpreted it as referring to resurrection or the soul’s experience after death, offering comfort to the ill person that even if they die, they will ‘awaken’ to divine presence.

[i] This phrase literally means ‘guard me like the pupil of the eye’ and uses the anatomical metaphor of the most protected and vulnerable part of the body to request divine protection—particularly appropriate for the physically vulnerable ill person.

[ii] The imagery of hiding under God’s wings appears frequently in psalms and was especially significant in Ma’avar Yabok’s kabbalistic framework, where it symbolized being brought ‘under the wings of the Divine Presence’ during illness and at death.

[iii] The Hebrew ‘oyevai b’nefesh’ (my soul-enemies) refers to those who seek the psalmist’s life. In the context of Ma’avar Yabok, this would be interpreted both literally as human enemies and mystically as the negative spiritual forces (chitzonim) that threaten the soul during illness.

[iv] The lion metaphor resonates with kabbalistic traditions that sometimes portrayed the Angel of Death (Samael) as lion-like in his fierceness and predatory nature.

[v] This difficult verse can be understood as ‘from men by Your hand, O LORD, from men of the world/age.’ The term ‘meḥeled’ (from the world/duration) appears in the text with a variant spelling, reflecting the textual fluidity common in liturgical manuscripts.

[A] Or: "Listen, O heavens" — While 'give ear' is more poetically faithful to the Hebrew, 'listen' provides a more contemporary, accessible rendering that maintains the meaning without the archaic phrasing.

[B] Or: "Who is like You among the divine beings, O LORD?" — The Hebrew term 'eilim' (בָּאֵלִם) can refer either to the 'mighty ones' or more specifically to 'divine beings/gods.' The latter translation more explicitly acknowledges the biblical polytheistic context where YHWH is compared to other divine beings, which would be consistent with academic translations seeking to preserve original cultural contexts.

[C] Or: "inspiring awe through praises" — This alternative more clearly conveys that the praiseworthy acts themselves inspire awe, rather than suggesting that God is awesome while being praised. The Hebrew construction allows for this interpretive nuance.

[2] This powerful opening invokes heaven and earth as witnesses, a common biblical rhetorical device used in solemn proclamations. In the context of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, this summons the entire cosmos to participate in the plea for healing.

[3] This phrase from the Song of the Sea (Shirat HaYam) invokes God's incomparable power to perform miracles. In healing prayers, it serves as a reminder that God's ability to heal transcends natural limitations.

[4] The repeated reference to God's "right hand" is significant in Jewish mystical tradition, where it represents the attribute of mercy (chesed) as opposed to the left hand of judgment (din). In healing contexts, this invokes God's merciful healing power rather than strict judgment.

[vi] The phrase 'when I awake, with Your likeness' was interpreted in Jewish tradition both as awakening from sleep and metaphorically as resurrection. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this verse would offer hope to the ill person that even if they die, they will 'awaken' to divine presence in the afterlife.

[vii] Cf. Zohar — Ma'avar Yabok would interpret the psalm's phrase 'under the shadow of Your wings' in light of this Zoharic teaching, where the divine wings represent the Shekhinah's protection over souls, particularly during illness and at the moment of death. | Cf. Psalm 91 — The themes of divine protection in Psalm 17 parallel those in Psalm 91, which is prominently featured elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequences for the sick and dying. Both psalms use images of divine shelter and deliverance from enemies, which would be understood as protection from both physical affliction and spiritual dangers during illness. | Cf. Book of Job — The psalm's reference to God examining the heart, visiting at night, and testing resonates with Job's description of divine scrutiny. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this connection would suggest that illness, like Job's suffering, involves divine examination that ultimately leads to spiritual purification.

[i] This heading indicates that the following verses are specifically selected from the Torah (Pentateuch), the first five books of the Hebrew Bible. The Ma'avar Yabok organizes verses into three categories: Torah, Prophets (נביאים), and Writings (כתובים), following the traditional Jewish division of scripture.

[ii] This verse opens the Song of Moses in Deuteronomy 32:1, where heaven and earth are called as witnesses to God's covenant with Israel. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse invokes cosmic witnesses for the prayers being offered on behalf of the sick person.

[iii] From the Song of the Sea in Exodus 15:11, sung after the Israelites' deliverance at the Red Sea. In this context, it appeals to God's unparalleled power to perform wonders, specifically the wonder of healing.

[iv] From Exodus 15:6, continuing the Song of the Sea. The right hand in Jewish tradition symbolizes mercy and healing power. Here, the "enemy" can be interpreted as illness or death threatening the sick person.

[1]This verse from God's covenant with Abraham carries special significance in healing prayers as it reminds of God's protective relationship with Israel and suggests that those who care for the sick (blessing them) will themselves receive blessing.

[2]The final phrase "you shall be a blessing" (והיה ברכה) takes on particular poignancy in the context of prayers for the sick, expressing hope that the ill person will recover to continue being a source of blessing to others.

[3]The repetition of 'I' (אָנֹכִי) in the Hebrew creates emphasis that the speaker is personally committed to praising God despite their circumstances, which models the attitude recommended for the sick person.

[4]The imagery of God 'thundering' from heaven portrays divine intervention as powerful and dramatic, suggesting that healing can come suddenly and decisively.

[5]The 'horn' (קֶרֶן) is a biblical symbol of strength and power. In healing contexts, this suggests

[v]From Genesis 12:3, God's promise to Abraham. In this context, it reminds of the covenantal relationship between God and the Jewish people, appealing to divine protection.

[i]From Genesis 13:17, God's instruction to Abraham to walk throughout the Promised Land. In the context of healing prayers, this may symbolize a hope for the sick person to regain mobility and strength.

[ii]From Genesis 12:2, the beginning of God's covenant with Abraham. The phrase "והיה ברכה" (and be a blessing) is particularly significant as it expresses hope that the sick person will recover and continue to be a source of blessing to others.

[iii]Cf. Deuteronomy 32:1 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse serves to invoke cosmic witnesses for the healing prayers, elevating the supplication to a cosmic level and emphasizing the solemnity of the appeal for divine intervention. | Cf. Exodus 15:11-12 — These verses recalling God's greatest miracle of salvation for the Israelites are repurposed in Ma'avar Yabok to invoke the same divine power for healing. The 'enemy' being shattered is implicitly reinterpreted as illness or the Angel of Death. | Cf. Genesis 12:2-3 — These verses remind the reader of the covenantal relationship between God and the Jewish people, serving as the basis for approaching God with requests for healing. They also suggest that caring for the sick fulfills the Abrahamic mission to be a blessing to others. | Cf. Genesis 13:17 — In the context of healing prayers, this verse is reimagined as a hope for physical restoration—that the sick person will regain the ability to rise and walk freely through the land. It transforms a verse about territorial possession into one about bodily autonomy and health.

[iv]This opening verse is taken from the Song of Deborah (Judges 5:3), a victory song after defeating Israel's enemies. Beginning with this powerful declaration establishes a tone of confidence and praise even in difficult circumstances.

[v]These verses from Hannah's prayer (1 Samuel 2:10) were spoken after she received her son Samuel following years of barrenness. In the context of illness, they portray physical afflictions as 'adversaries' that God has power to break apart.

[vi]This verse (Judges 6:23) was spoken to Gideon who feared he would die after seeing the angel of the LORD. Its inclusion here provides direct divine reassurance against the fear of death that often accompanies serious illness.

restoration of the sick person's diminished strength through divine favor.

[1]This direct divine reassurance against death would be particularly comforting for seriously ill individuals who fear their condition might be terminal.

[2]The Hebrew phrase 'עָשָׂה הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה' (worked/acted this day) suggests that divine deliverance comes through active partnership between human and divine efforts, a concept relevant to healing which requires both medical intervention and spiritual faith.

[3]This verse from Isaiah frames suffering as temporary divine displeasure that gives way to comfort, providing a theological framework for understanding illness as a transient state rather than a permanent condition.

[4]The Hebrew phrase 'מַעַיְנֵי הַיְשׁוּעָה' (wells of salvation) presents divine healing as an abundant resource that can be actively accessed, encouraging the sick person to participate in their own recovery through spiritual practices.

[i]This narrative (1 Samuel 14:45) describes how Jonathan was saved from execution by his father Saul. In the context of healing prayers, it serves as a powerful example of deliverance from a death sentence through divine intervention.

[ii]This threefold blessing of peace (shalom) from 1 Samuel 25:6 extends beyond physical healing to encompass the person's household and possessions, suggesting that true divine healing is comprehensive in nature.

[iii]This verse from Isaiah 12:3 uses the metaphor of drawing water from wells of salvation with joy. In healing contexts, it suggests that divine healing power is abundant like flowing water, and should be approached with joyful expectation rather than despair.

[iv]Cf. Book of Judges 5:3 — This opening verse from Deborah's triumphant song is used to begin this collection of prophetic verses, establishing a tone of divine praise and victory. Its inclusion suggests that the sick person should adopt a similar attitude of trust and praise despite their circumstances. | Cf. 1 Samuel 2:2 — Hannah's declaration of God's uniqueness and strength

(Writings) I called to the LORD with my voice,[2] and He answered me from His holy mountain. Selah. When I call, answer me, O God of my righteousness; You have relieved me in my distress; be gracious to 250R me and hear my prayer. Give ear to my words, O LORD, consider my meditation. Listen to the voice of my cry, my King and my God, for to You I will pray. O LORD, do not rebuke me in Your anger, nor chasten me in Your hot displeasure. O LORD 255R my God, in You I put my trust; save me from all those who persecute me, and deliver me. My shield is with God, who saves the upright in heart. His left hand is under my head, and His right hand embraces me.[A] Behold, Solomon's bed, with sixty mighty men 260R

[A] Or: "Let His left hand be under my head, and His right hand embrace me" — This could be translated in the jussive mood (expressing a wish) rather than the indicative, which would better reflect how it might function in a prayer context where the supplicant is seeking divine comfort rather than stating it as a present reality.

[1] The Hebrew distinguishes between 'רִנָּה' (cry/joyful shout) and 'תְּפִלָּה' (structured prayer), suggesting that God responds to both emotional outpourings and formal liturgical approaches, giving the sick person multiple ways to seek divine healing.

[2] This compilation of verses begins with expressions of confidence that God hears and answers prayer (Psalm 3:4), establishing a foundation of trust for the sick person or those praying on their behalf.

provides assurance that there is no divine power like God, establishing the theological foundation for trusting in divine healing power. | Cf. 1 Samuel 2:10 — This verse completes the reference to Hannah's prayer, showing God's authority over adversaries and ability to strengthen the faithful, which would comfort those facing illness. | Cf. Judges 6:23 — This verse provides direct divine reassurance against fear of death, making it particularly relevant for the sick and dying who might fear their condition. | Cf. Joshua 1:8 — This verse emphasizes the importance of Torah study and observance as a source of divine blessing and success, suggesting spiritual practices that might aid recovery. | Cf. 1 Samuel 14:45 — This narrative of Jonathan's rescue from death serves as a metaphor for divine deliverance from a death sentence, offering hope to the seriously ill. | Cf. 1 Samuel 25:6 — This threefold peace blessing is included to invoke comprehensive wellbeing (shalom) for the sick person and their household. | Cf. Isaiah 12:1-3 — These verses transform divine anger into comfort and salvation, providing a spiritual framework for viewing illness as temporary and giving way to eventual deliverance. | Cf. 2 Samuel 7:29 — This prayer for enduring blessing connects immediate healing needs to long-term divine favor, emphasizing continuity of life rather than its end. | Cf. 1 Kings 8:28 — This concluding verse from Solomon's prayer expresses humility and dependence on divine attention, modeling how the sick should approach God with both cry (emotional appeal) and structured prayer.

[i] This Hebrew heading indicates that what follows is a collection of verses from the Ketuvim (Writings), the third section of the Hebrew Bible. In Ma'avar Yabok, this collection appears as part of a structured prayer sequence for the sick and dying.

[ii] Selah is a musical or liturgical notation that appears frequently in Psalms, likely indicating a pause, musical interlude, or shift in emphasis. Its exact meaning remains uncertain, but in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it creates natural pauses in the prayer sequence.

[iii] This verse from Song of Songs 2:6 shifts the text from psalms to a verse expressing intimate divine embrace. In the original context, it describes lovers, but here it's repurposed to describe God's tender care for the sick person.

around it,[1] of the mighty men of Israel. They all hold swords, being expert in war; each man has his sword on his thigh because of fear in the night. Set me as a seal upon your heart, as a seal upon your arm; for love is as strong as death,[2] jealousy as cruel as the grave; its flames are flames of fire, a most vehement flame. Stay this night, and in the morning, if he will redeem you, good; let him redeem you. But if he is not willing to redeem you, then I will redeem you, as the LORD lives. Lie down until morning.[A] I lay down and slept; I awoke, for the LORD sustained me. The LORD's lovingkindnesses indeed never cease, for His compassions never fail. They are new every morning; great is Your faithfulness.[3] "The LORD is my portion," says my soul, "Therefore I hope in Him." But as for me, I will come into Your house in the multitude of Your mercy; in fear of You I will worship toward Your holy temple. Lead me, O LORD, in Your righteousness because of my enemies; make Your way straight before my face. For You, O LORD, will bless the righteous; with favor You will surround him as with a shield. Salvation belongs to the LORD. Your blessing is upon Your people. Selah.[4]

[A] Or: "Remain this night, and when morning comes, if he redeems you, good; let him redeem you. But if he does not desire to redeem you, then I myself will redeem you, as the LORD lives. Rest until morning" — This alternate translation uses 'remain' and 'rest' instead of 'stay' and 'lie down,' which might better convey the spiritual comfort intended in this prayer context. The phrase 'when morning comes' rather than 'in the morning' emphasizes the certainty of dawn arriving, which symbolizes hope in a context of illness.

[1] This imagery from Song of Songs of warriors surrounding Solomon's bed takes on new meaning in the context of illness, symbolizing divine protection surrounding the sickbed. In kabbalistic interpretation, these sixty warriors may represent divine forces that protect the vulnerable soul.

[2] This profound verse from Song of Songs gains special significance in Ma'avar Yabok's context of approaching death. It suggests that divine love matches death's power, offering hope that love transcends mortality and continues beyond the grave.

[3] These hopeful verses from Lamentations would be particularly meaningful to the sick who face each day with uncertainty. The promise of renewed divine mercies each morning offers profound comfort that suffering is temporary and God's compassion is reliable.

[1] The collection concludes with an affirmation of divine blessing from Psalm 3:8, ending on a note

[i] This phrase from Song of Songs 3:8 referring to 'fear in the night' is particularly apt in the context of illness, as nighttime often brings increased anxiety, pain, and fear of death for the sick.

[ii] This rare Hebrew construction from Song of Songs 8:6 combines 'flame' with a divine suffix, literally meaning 'flame of Yah (God).' This suggests that love's power has a divine origin, which in the context of Ma'avar Yabok emphasizes God's passionate commitment to the suffering person.

[iii] This passage from Ruth 3:13 originally describes Boaz's promise to redeem Ruth, but in this prayer context, it becomes God's promise to redeem the suffering person, with morning symbolizing either recovery or peaceful transition to the afterlife.

[iv] This powerful verse from Lamentations 3:23 emphasizes divine mercy renewed each morning, offering particular comfort to the ill who measure their suffering day by day and need reassurance of continuing divine compassion.

That Your beloved ones may be delivered,[1] save with Your right hand, and answer me. Our shield, behold, O God, and look upon the face of Your anointed. I shall not die but live, and recount the works of the LORD. The LORD has surely chastened me, but He has not given me over to death. For in death there is no remembrance of You; in Sheol, who will give You thanks? Shall Your lovingkindness be declared in the grave, or Your faithfulness in the place of destruction?[2] Shall Your wonders be known in the darkness, and Your righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?[3] Will You work wonders for the dead?

[A] Or: "After completing each sequence, one should recite:" — This translation clarifies that 'seder' refers to a liturgical sequence, and that the instruction is to recite specific prayers after completing each one.

of confidence rather than supplication. This creates a spiritual journey from distress to assurance, modeling the transformation sought for the ill person.

[2] The Hebrew word 'יְדִידֶיךָ' (yedidecha) refers to those beloved by God. In this liturgical context of Ma'avar Yabok, it specifically applies to the sick person, positioning them as someone dear to God who deserves divine intervention.

[3] The Hebrew 'אֲבַדּוֹן' (Abaddon) is both a poetic name for the realm of the dead and, in Jewish mystical tradition, the deepest level of the underworld. This term emphasizes the complete separation from divine presence that death was understood to represent.

[1] This translation of 'אֶרֶץ נְשִׁיָּה' captures the concept of death as a realm where memory and con-

[v] Cf. Song of Songs — These passionate verses from Song of Songs are included to invoke divine protection and love during times of illness or distress. They create a sense of intimate divine protection, with imagery of embracing hands, guardians, and the powerful seal of love that is 'as strong as death.' In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses would comfort the sick by reassuring them of God's passionate care even in their vulnerable state. | Cf. Book of Ruth — The inclusion of Boaz's promise to Ruth ('Stay this night...I will redeem you') in this prayer collection suggests that it's being repurposed as a divine promise of redemption. Just as Boaz offered Ruth protection and redemption, God promises to redeem the ill person from their suffering, either through recovery or through a peaceful transition if death approaches. | Cf. Lamentations — These hopeful verses from Lamentations are particularly significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok as they offer reassurance that even in the darkest times of illness, God's compassions are 'new every morning.' For the sick who measure their suffering day by day, this promise of renewed divine mercy with each dawn would provide substantial comfort. | Cf. Psalms — The compiler of Ma'avar Yabok has carefully selected psalm verses that progress from cries for help to expressions of confidence in divine protection. This creates a spiritual journey from distress to trust that models the ideal psychological and spiritual transformation for the ill person or those praying on their behalf.

[i] This is a liturgical instruction that appears after the presentation of specific psalms and verses in each of the eight prayer sequences in the 'Seder' portion of Ma'avar Yabok. It tells the reader what to recite after completing each structured prayer order.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Seder section — The text is providing instructions for how to conclude each of the eight prayer sequences. These structured prayer orders were designed to be recited in sequence when visiting the sick or attending to the dying.

[iii] The phrase 'אֶרֶץ נְשִׁיָּה' (land of forgetfulness) is a poetic description of the realm of the dead, derived from a root meaning 'to forget.' This portrays death as a state where memory fades, contrasting with the vibrant remembrance and praise possible in life.

[iv] The term 'רְפָאִים' (translated as 'shades' or 'ghosts') carries significant theological weight. It refers to the shadowy existence of the dead in Sheol, emphasizing their powerlessness and inability to participate in divine worship. This theological concept reinforces the argument that recovery from illness serves divine purposes by enabling continued praise.

דּוֹמָה: וַאֲנַחְנוּ נְבָרֵךְ יָהּ מֵעַתָּה
וְעַד עוֹלָם הַלְלוּיָהּ:[i] מָה בֶּצַע
בְּדָמֵנוּ בְּרִדְתֵּנוּ אֶל שָׁחַת הֲיוֹדְךָ
עָפָר הֲיַגִּיד אֲמִתֶּךָ: כִּי לֹא שְׁאוֹל
תוֹדֶךָּ מָוֶת יְהַלְלֶךָּ לֹא יְשַׂבְּרוּ
יוֹרְדֵי בוֹר אֶל אֲמִתֶּךָ:[iii ii]

Will the shades rise up[1] to praise You? Selah. The dead do not praise the LORD, nor do any who go down into silence.[2] But we will bless the LORD from this time forth and forever. Hallelujah. What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Will the dust praise You? Will it declare Your truth? For Sheol cannot thank You; death cannot praise You; those who go down to the pit cannot hope for Your faithfulness.[3]

[iii ii] יאמר ג׳ פעמים [i] רפאני יהוה — One should recite three times: "Heal me, O LORD."[A]

[A] Or: "Recite three times: "Heal me, LORD."" — This more concise translation captures the essential instruction while maintaining the imperative tone. It might be preferred in contexts where brevity is valued, though it loses some of the formal quality of the original translation.

sciousness fade. The prayer uses this imagery to argue that divine attributes cannot be properly acknowledged in such a state of forgetting.

[2] I've translated 'רְפָאִים' as 'shades' to capture the sense of insubstantial, shadowy existence attributed to the dead. Other possible translations include 'ghosts' or 'departed spirits.' The term suggests that while these entities might continue to exist in some form, they lack the capacity for proper worship.

[3] The Hebrew 'יוֹרְדֵי דוּמָה' (yordei dumah) literally means 'those who descend to silence/stillness.' This poetic description of death emphasizes the cessation of speech and praise, which is central to the prayer's argument that God benefits more from keeping the person alive.

[1] The final phrase 'לֹא יְשַׂבְּרוּ יוֹרְדֵי בוֹר אֶל אֲמִתֶּךָ' literally means 'those who go down to the pit cannot hope for Your truth/faithfulness.' I've expanded slightly to clarify the meaning that the dead cannot place their hope in divine faithfulness as the living can.

[i] This collection of verses serves as a concluding prayer for each of the eight liturgical sequences (sedarim) in the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok. These verses are strategically selected from various psalms to create a coherent theological argument for healing based on the premise that the living, not the dead, can praise God.

[ii] This collection of verses forms a chiastic structure, beginning and ending with similar themes about the impossibility of praising God in death, creating a rhetorical frame that emphasizes the central message: only the living can properly serve God through praise and thanksgiving.

[iii] Cf. Psalm 60:5 — This verse begins a collection of biblical quotations specifically chosen for the sick or dying, invoking God's salvation for His beloved ones (the ill person). The use of this verse in Ma'avar Yabok recontextualizes a national prayer for Israel's deliverance into a personal plea for healing. | Cf. Psalm 84:9 — This verse reinforces the prayer for divine protection. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, the 'anointed' can be understood as the ill person who requires divine attention and healing. | Cf. Psalm 118:17-18 — These verses express hope for recovery and recognition that illness may serve as divine correction rather than punishment unto death. This aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework that suffering can function as spiritual purification. | Cf. Psalm 6:5-6 — These verses present a theological argument for healing based on the premise that the living, not the dead, can praise God. This reflects a common biblical theme that death ends the opportunity for divine service, used here as motivation for God to heal the ill person. | Cf. Psalm 88:10-13 — These questions continue the theological argument that divine wonders, faithfulness, and righteousness cannot be proclaimed in death. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, these verses function as a persuasive appeal to God that healing the sick person would enable continued divine praise. | Cf. Psalm 115:17-18 — This passage provides the theological resolution—while the dead cannot praise God, the living can and will bless God eternally. In the context of a prayer for healing, this serves as both a plea for life and a promise of continued devotion if healing occurs. | Cf. Psalm 30:9-10 — These verses continue the theme that death prevents divine praise, suggesting that God would gain more from the person's continued life and thanksgiving than from their death. | Cf. Isaiah 38:18-19 — Though not directly quoted, the final verse echoes King Hezekiah's prayer during his illness, which similarly argues that the living, not the dead, can praise God. This connection is significant in Ma'avar Yabok, as Hezekiah's recovery from near-death illness would serve as a hopeful exemplar for the sick person.

[A]Or: "Rescue me from the trap they have set for me" — This alternative translation uses more contemporary language and captures the metaphorical sense of being trapped by illness or misfortune. It might be preferable in a translation aimed at modern readers seeking immediate comprehension over preserving the exact biblical phrasing.

[2]The Hebrew expresses both a request and a certainty—the prayer asks for divine healing while simultaneously affirming confidence that such healing will occur. This grammatical structure creates a statement of faith within the request itself.

[3]The Priestly Blessing progression moves from physical protection to spiritual illumination to the highest blessing of divine attention and peace. In the context of healing prayers, this creates a comprehensive invocation of divine favor.

[4]The Aramaic word 'סַבָּרִית' (translated as 'I hope') has a stronger connotation than mere hoping—it suggests patient anticipation with certainty, a focused waiting with complete trust that divine salvation will arrive.

[iv]The Hebrew notation 'ג' פעמים׳ (pronounced 'gimel pe'amim') is a common instruction in Jewish liturgical texts meaning 'three times.' The letter ג (gimel) has the numerical value of 3.

[v]This phrase 'Refa'eni Adonai' (Heal me, O LORD) is from Jeremiah 17:14. In Ma'avar Yabok, this instruction appears within the 'Seder' section containing structured prayer sequences for the sick and dying.

[vi]Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This verse from Jeremiah is particularly powerful in Ma'avar Yabok's context as it expresses complete dependence on divine healing rather than human intervention. The threefold repetition intensifies this appeal for divine mercy and strengthens the connection between the sick person and God as the ultimate healer. | Cf. Psalm 30 — This prayer instruction in Ma'avar Yabok connects to a broader tradition of healing prayers in biblical literature, especially in Psalms, where healing is directly attributed to divine intervention. The threefold repetition creates a meditative focus on God's healing power.

[i]This opening line quotes Jeremiah 17:14, a verse that became central to Jewish healing prayers. The Hebrew uses a reflexive form 'I shall be healed' (וְאֵרָפֵא), emphasizing that divine healing activates one's own healing capacity.

[ii]This line from Psalm 31:6 was traditionally recited at bedtime and became associated with the moment of death. According to rabbinic tradition, it should be a person's final utterance, and was reportedly spoken by Rabbi Akiva during his martyrdom.

[iii]This triple repetition of Genesis 49:18 with varied word order follows a kabbalistic pattern where the same verse is recited three times with different arrangements of the words to access different spiritual channels and maximize efficacy.

[iv]This Aramaic translation of 'For Your salvation I wait' follows the same pattern of triple repetition with varied word order. The use of Aramaic (the vernacular language of Jews in the Talmudic period) alongside Hebrew was believed to make prayers more accessible to the heavenly court.

[A] Or: "joyful shouts of salvation" — This alternative better captures the exuberant quality of the Hebrew term 'רְנִי' which suggests ringing cries of joy rather than composed songs. It might be preferable in contexts emphasizing the emotional aspects of divine deliverance.

[B] Or: "Shekhinah of God" — Keeping the Hebrew term 'Shekhinah' preserves the kabbalistic connotations of this specific manifestation of divine presence, which has feminine associations in Jewish mysticism. This might be preferable in scholarly translations or those preserving mystical terminology.

[A] Or: "Bandage my wounds" — This alternative is more concrete and medical in tone, which might better fit the context of prayers for physical healing, though it loses some of the poetic quality of the original translation.

[1] This five-directional protection (four horizontal directions plus above) creates a complete spiritual enclosure around the ill person. The Divine Presence (Shekhinah) above completes the protection, as the four angels are understood as extensions of divine power rather than independent forces.

[i] This protective formula invoking the four archangels appeared in various Jewish mystical texts and became part of the bedtime Shema prayer. Each angel corresponds to a direction and has specific protective functions: Michael (right/south/water) represents mercy; Gabriel (left/north/fire) represents strength; Raphael (front/east/air) represents healing; Nuriel (back/west/earth) represents divine light.

[ii] Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This verse begins the healing prayer with a recognition that true healing comes only from God. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this establishes divine healing as the foundation for prayers for the sick. | Cf. Psalm 31:5-6 — These verses from Psalm 31 were traditionally associated with deathbed prayers, especially 'Into Your hand I commit my spirit,' which was reportedly recited by Jesus on the cross. Their inclusion in this healing prayer creates a connection between healing prayers and preparation for death. | Cf. Priestly Blessing (Numbers 6:24-26) — The inclusion of the Priestly Blessing in this healing prayer invokes divine protection, grace, and peace for the ill person. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this connects the individual's healing to the cosmic channels of divine blessing. | Cf. Genesis 49:18 — This verse from Jacob's deathbed blessing is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok, as the book's title refers to Jacob's crossing of the Yabok River. The triple repetition of this verse in slightly varied forms emphasizes patient hope in divine salvation. | Cf. Psalm 32:7 — This psalm verse expresses trust in divine protection, describing God as both a hiding place and a source of joyful deliverance, creating a protective spiritual atmosphere around the ill person. | Cf. Angelic prayer formula — This protective angelic formula appears in various Jewish mystical texts and was commonly used as a protective prayer before sleep. In Ma'avar Yabok, it creates a metaphysical shield around the ill person, with each angel corresponding to a different direction and divine attribute. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Berakhot 60b — This four-fold blessing creates a continuous cycle of divine praise throughout all times and states of consciousness. In Ma'avar Yabok, this serves to ensure divine protection throughout the sick person's day, symbolically extending to all phases of their illness.

[B] Or: "to wrap my suffering" — This more literal rendering of 'חתל' as 'wrap' rather than 'bandage' preserves the physical image of binding or swaddling pain, though it's less idiomatic in English.

[C] Or: "Behold, for You, O God, my heart waits" — This alternative is more direct and literal, emphasizing patient waiting rather than expectant looking. It may better capture the Hebrew 'יקוה' which connotes waiting with hope.

[A] Or: "Here concludes the first liturgical sequence." — This alternate translation makes explicit the liturgical nature of the 'seder' being concluded, which might be helpful for readers unfamiliar with Jewish liturgical terminology.

[1] This poetic opening creates ambiguity about whether God is being asked to bind up the speaker's brokenness, or is being addressed as 'my fortress and my light' who binds up brokenness. Both readings are possible in the Hebrew, and this ambiguity is likely intentional.

[2] This powerful metaphor from Psalm 56 envisions God collecting human tears in a container, preserving them as precious. In Jewish mystical thought, these preserved tears become the basis for future consolation and redemption.

[1] This concluding verse from Psalm 19:15 is frequently used to end prayers in Jewish liturgy. In the context of prayers for the sick, it takes on added significance as a plea that one's final communications with God be received favorably.

[iii] This is a liturgical instruction phrase that appears frequently throughout Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences. It guides the prayer leader through the structured orders (sedarim) of prayers for the sick and dying, indicating the transition to the next component in the sequence.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This phrase appears frequently in the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok to indicate transitions between different prayer components. It provides liturgical instruction to the person leading prayers for the sick or dying, showing how the structured prayer sequences should flow. | Cf. Traditional Jewish prayer books (siddurim) — This formulaic instructional phrase resembles those found in traditional Jewish prayer books, which often use similar transitional instructions to guide users through complex liturgical sequences. The author is employing a familiar format that would be recognizable to those accustomed to using prayer books.

[v] This opening line uses several metaphors from the Psalms: God as one who 'binds up' wounds (Psalm 147:3), as a 'fortress' (מָצוּדָה in Psalm 18:3), and as 'light' (Psalm 27:1). These are combined into a personal plea for healing.

[i] The term 'יְחִידָתִי' (my unique one) is a biblical term for the soul found in Psalms (22:21, 35:17). This poetic phrase expresses that only the soul yearns for God's name, emphasizing spiritual connection over physical healing.

[ii] The image of God collecting tears in a bottle or flask (נֹאד) comes from Psalm 56:9 and represents divine remembrance of human suffering. This biblical metaphor would be particularly comforting to the ill or dying.

[2]This is the second of eight prayer sequences (sedarim) in Ma'avar Yabok designed for the sick and dying. Each sequence follows a similar structure but offers different psalm options.

[3]The term 'seder' (order) in this context refers to one of eight standardized liturgical sequences in Ma'avar Yabok for praying on behalf of the sick. Each sequence follows a similar structure but varies in content to address different situations or needs.

[4]This is the opening phrase of Genesis 48:16, part of Jacob's blessing to his grandchildren. The full verse continues: 'The Angel who has redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads; let my name be named upon them, and the name of my fathers Abraham and Isaac; and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth.' This prayer was considered particularly effective for healing and protection.

[1]In the context of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm's opening verses about cosmic

[iii]Cf. Psalms 6:9 — This verse is used to express the sick person's conviction that God has heard their prayers, creating a spiritual boundary against negative forces. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this signals a transition from distress to divine protection during illness. | Cf. Psalms 56:9 — This reference emphasizes the belief that God carefully accounts for every aspect of human suffering, which would be particularly comforting to the sick or dying. It suggests that no pain is meaningless or forgotten by God. | Cf. Psalms 46:8 — This reference provides assurance of divine presence during illness, with the military title 'LORD of hosts' suggesting God's power to protect and defend the sick person against all spiritual and physical threats. | Cf. Psalms 84:13 — This verse reinforces the theme of trust in God during illness, suggesting that even in suffering, one finds blessing through maintaining faith in divine care. | Cf. Psalms 20:10 — This verse functions as a direct petition for healing and divine response, appropriate for someone who is ill and seeking immediate divine intervention. | Cf. Psalms 19:15 — This concluding verse serves as a final request that the entire prayer be accepted by God. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it's particularly significant as it might be among the last prayers a person recites, expressing hope that their final words will find divine acceptance.

[i]This phrase literally means "until here" and is a common rabbinic formula used to mark the end of a textual unit or section.

[ii]This refers to "the first order" (Seder Alef), which is the first of eight structured prayer sequences in this section of Ma'avar Yabok.

[iii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok—Seder structure — The phrase 'Thus ends the first order' indicates a clear structural demarcation in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical arrangement. The text organizes prayers for the sick and dying into eight distinct 'sedarim' (orders), each with a standardized structure. This concluding marker helps users of the text navigate between different prayer sequences when caring for the ill. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok—Prayer structure — This marker concludes the first complete liturgical sequence of Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer orders. The author Aaron Berechia organized these prayers methodically to provide clear guidance for those attending the sick. Similar markers would appear at the conclusion of each of the eight orders, helping users navigate this practical manual.

[iv]Cf. The first order (סדר א) — The text is referencing a previously established prayer sequence that begins with 'Ana Hashem hoshiah na' (Please, O LORD, save us), directing the reader to follow that opening formula before continuing with the variations presented here. | Cf. The Angel, the Redeemer (המלאך הגואל) — This biblical verse is used as a protective prayer for the sick.

harmony serve as a reminder that the sufferer's condition exists within a divinely ordered universe. The psalm transitions from natural revelation (heavens/firmament) to revealed Torah, suggesting a progression from general awareness of God to the specific healing power of divine commandments.

[2]The phrase 'meshivat nafesh' (restoring the soul) is particularly significant in the context of prayers for the sick, as it suggests the Torah's capacity to revitalize not just spiritually but physically. Ma'avar Yabok frequently presents scriptural recitation as having healing power.

[1]This verse aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on confession and spiritual purification during illness. The book presents illness as potentially resulting from unrecognized sins, and this verse's plea for cleansing from 'hidden faults' reflects the ideal spiritual attitude of the sick person seeking both physical and spiritual healing.

The reference to Jacob is particularly significant given the book's title 'Ma'avar Yabok,' which references Jacob's crossing of the Jabbok River. This creates a thematic connection between Jacob's transformative experience and the sick person's hope for divine intervention.

[i]The Hebrew uses 'El' (אֵל) rather than the Tetragrammaton here, while later verses use the Tetragrammaton (יְיָ) when referring to Torah and commandments, suggesting a distinction between God's revelation in nature versus Torah.

[ii]The term 'קַוָּם' (kavam/their line) has been interpreted variously as referring to their measuring line, their rule/domain, or their voice/sound. In Ma'avar Yabok's context of healing prayer, this likely emphasizes how divine influence extends throughout all creation.

[iii]The wedding imagery comparing the sun to a bridegroom emerging from his chamber corresponds to kabbalistic concepts of divine unification that appear throughout Ma'avar Yabok. Such imagery would be especially meaningful in a text concerned with the soul's transition.

(Psalm 20) For the Chief Musician. A Psalm of David. May the LORD answer you in the day of trouble;[1] may the name of the God of Jacob set you up on high. May He send you help from the sanctuary, and support you from Zion. May He remember all your offerings, and accept your burnt sacrifice. Selah.[A] May He grant you according to your heart's desire, and fulfill all your counsel. We will rejoice in your salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners.[B] May the LORD fulfill all your petitions. Now I know that the LORD saves His anointed; He will answer him from His holy heaven with the saving strength of His right hand. Some trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will remember the name of the LORD our God. They have bowed down and fallen, but we have risen and stand upright.[C] Save, LORD! May the King answer

[A] Or: "find your burnt offering pleasingly fat. Selah" — This more literal translation preserves the sacrificial imagery of fat as a sign of quality and divine pleasure. In ancient sacrificial practice, the fat portions were considered the choicest parts, so a "fat" sacrifice was particularly pleasing to God.

[B] Or: "We will sing for joy at your victory, and raise our banners in the name of our God" — This translation better captures the public, celebratory nature of both the singing (רנן/ranan specifically means 'joyful singing') and the banner-raising, emphasizing the communal celebration of divine deliverance rather than just internal rejoicing.

[A] Or: "They collapse and fall, but we rise and remain steadfast" — This translation uses present tense to capture the timeless, paradigmatic nature of this contrast, and "steadfast" better conveys

[2] This psalm was likely composed for a king going into battle and later adapted for general liturgical use in times of distress. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it takes on special significance for the sick and dying who are facing their own "day of trouble."

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The psalm's inclusion in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences for the sick reflects its themes of divine order in creation and the restorative power of God's Torah. The final verse (19:15) 'May the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable before You' serves as a particularly appropriate prayer for someone facing illness or death, expressing hope that their prayers will be received favorably by God. | Cf. Jewish liturgy — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok connects the sick person's prayers to the familiar liturgical framework of daily prayer, particularly the concluding verse which would be well-known to Jewish worshippers. This creates continuity between regular prayer practice and prayers offered during illness. | Cf. Zohar — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm's inclusion likely invokes kabbalistic interpretations where the cosmic order described in the first half of the psalm corresponds to divine emanations, while the Torah's perfection in the second half represents the spiritual remedy for the sick person—connecting them to divine harmony through sacred text.

[i] The Hebrew term "lamnatzeach" (לַמְנַצֵּחַ) that begins many psalms likely refers to the choirmaster or music director of the Temple, indicating the psalm was meant to be performed liturgically.

[ii] The term "yedashene" (יְדַשְּׁנֶה) literally means "make fat" and refers to accepting a sacrifice as especially pleasing, implying divine approval. "Selah" is a musical notation possibly indicating a pause or musical interlude.

[iii] The Hebrew "nidgol" (נִדְגֹּל) comes from the root meaning "banner" or "flag" and implies a public, celebratory declaration of allegiance. In this context, it suggests publicly proclaiming loyalty to God's name.

[iv] This phrase contrasts reliance on military might (chariots and horses were ancient symbols of military power) with reliance on God, a recurring theme in biblical literature.

My strength is dried up like baked clay, and my tongue cleaves to my palate; You lay me in the dust of death.[3] For dogs surround me; a pack of evildoers the Hebrew nitodad (נִתְעוֹדָד) which implies not just standing but being firmly established or strengthened.

[1]The psalm concludes with a collective prayer ("us") rather than the individual address ("you") of the opening, emphasizing how individual suffering is embraced by communal prayer. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper communal presence during illness and at the moment of death.

[2]This poetic expression suggests that God's presence is manifest through Israel's prayers and worship, a concept particularly resonant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok where proper prayers are seen as creating divine channels between realms.

[3]This powerful metaphor for mortality appears in a psalm that Ma'avar Yabok recommends for recitation by or for the seriously ill. The imagery of physical deterioration and divine abandonment would have particular resonance for those facing death.

[v]Cf. Psalm 91 — Both psalms emphasize divine protection in times of trouble, though Psalm 20 focuses more on communal support while Psalm 91 addresses individual divine protection. | Cf. The Shema prayer — This psalm follows the classic Jewish prayer structure of praise followed by petition, making it particularly suitable for inclusion in standardized prayer sequences for the sick. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This psalm's inclusion in the 'Seder' prayer sequences suggests it was considered to have special healing properties when recited properly, possibly related to its themes of divine support in times of trouble.

But You, O LORD, be not distant; my Strength, hasten to my aid. Deliver my soul from the sword, my only one from the grip of the dog. Save me from the lion's mouth, and from the horns of wild oxen—You have answered me. I will proclaim Your name to my brethren; in the midst of the congregation I will praise You. You who fear the LORD, praise Him; all you descendants of Jacob, honor Him, and stand in awe of Him, all you descendants of Israel. For He has not despised nor abhorred the suffering of the afflicted, nor has He hidden His face from him; but when he cried out to Him, He heard. From You comes my praise in the great congregation; I will fulfill my vows before those who fear Him.[1] The humble shall eat and be satisfied; those who seek Him will praise the LORD. May your hearts live forever! All the ends of the earth shall remember and return to the LORD, and all the families of nations shall bow down before You. For kingship belongs to the LORD, and He rules over the nations. All the robust of the earth shall eat and prostrate themselves; before Him shall bow all who descend to the dust, and he whose soul cannot be kept alive. Offspring shall serve Him; it shall be told of the Lord to the coming generation. They shall come and declare His righteousness to a people yet to be born, for He has done it.

רֹעִי לֹא אֶחְסָר: בִּנְאוֹת דֶּשֶׁא

(Psalm 23) A psalm of David. The LORD is my shepherd;[2] I shall not want. He makes me lie down

[1] The theme of fulfilling vows connects to Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper confession and spiritual preparation before death, including the resolution of unfulfilled religious commitments.

[2] This psalm employs the metaphor of God as a shepherd, a powerful image in Jewish tradition that portrays divine care and guidance. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this pastoral imagery would be understood as especially comforting to the ill or dying, suggesting divine guidance through the transition between life and death.

[i] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Seder section — The inclusion of Psalm 22 in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences is significant due to its powerful expressions of both abandonment and ultimate divine rescue. For the seriously ill, this psalm provides a spiritual vocabulary that acknowledges profound suffering while maintaining faith in divine salvation. | Cf. Zohar — This psalm's vivid descriptions of physical and spiritual suffering align with Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework where suffering is understood as a process of spiritual refinement rather than mere punishment.

[ii] This superscription attributes the psalm to King David, who was himself a shepherd before becoming king. This biographical connection adds depth to the pastoral imagery used throughout the psalm.

[A] Or: "and I shall return to the house of the LORD for length of days" — The Hebrew verb 'veshavti' carries a dual meaning of both 'dwelling' and 'returning,' and 'le'orekh yamim' literally means 'for length of days' rather than 'forever.' This alternate translation preserves both the sense of returning to a spiritual home and the extended but not necessarily infinite timeframe suggested by the Hebrew phrase.

[1] This famous phrase represents the darkest moments of human experience, including severe illness and the approach of death. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse would be particularly significant as it directly addresses the book's central concern—providing comfort and guidance for those traversing this 'valley' either literally (the dying) or figuratively (the seriously ill).

[2] The Hebrew phrase וְיִדְגּוּ לָרֹב employs an unusual verb form derived from the word for 'fish' (דג), creating a vivid image of multiplication and abundance like fish spawning. This blessing for proliferation would resonate powerfully in a context of illness where life itself might be threatened.

[i] The Hebrew phrase 'gei tzalmavet' (valley of the shadow of death) is a powerful metaphor that appears in Ma'avar Yabok as particularly relevant for those who are ill or dying. In the context of this book, this phrase takes on heightened significance as it directly addresses the journey through mortality that the entire work is concerned with.

[ii] The Hebrew verb 'veshavti' can be translated as 'I shall dwell' but also carries connotations of 'returning' or 'sitting,' suggesting both permanent residence and a homecoming. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this final verse would be interpreted as referring to the soul's eternal dwelling in the divine presence after death.

[iii] Cf. Zohar — Ma'avar Yabok's inclusion of this psalm in its liturgical sequences for the sick and dying draws on the Zoharic interpretation that sees the entire psalm as a metaphor for the soul's journey through death to eternal divine presence. This kabbalistic reading reinforces the book's purpose of providing spiritual comfort during the transition between worlds. | Cf. Berakhot — By including Psalm 23 in its prayer sequences for the sick and dying, Ma'avar Yabok follows a long-standing Jewish tradition referenced in the Talmud of using this psalm for comfort during times of transition between life and death. This reinforces the book's grounding in traditional Jewish approaches to death and mourning.

[iv] This indicates that the verses come from the Torah (Pentateuch), which was standard practice in prayer compilations to identify the scriptural source. Ma'avar Yabok organizes biblical verses by their source (Torah, Prophets, Writings) to create a comprehensive spiritual framework for healing prayers.

[v] The phrase 'the angel who redeems' is significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, as it connects to the book's focus on spiritual protection during transitions. In Jewish mystical tradition, angels serve as guides for the soul during critical moments of transition, including illness and death.

[vi] This unusual phrase means 'may they multiply like fish,' employing a verb derived from the noun 'fish' (דג). Fish were seen as symbols of fertility and blessing since they multiply abundantly and are protected by water from the evil eye.

Do not stretch out your hand against the lad, nor do anything to him, for now I know that you fear God, since you have not withheld your son, your only one, from Me. Arise, lift up the lad and grasp your hand upon him, for I will make him into a great nation. For I will surely bless you and greatly multiply your seed like the stars of heaven and like the sand that is on the seashore, and your seed shall inherit the gate of their enemies. O LORD, You will establish peace for us, for You have also performed all our works for us. O LORD, in distress they sought You; they poured out a whispered prayer when Your chastening was upon them. Indeed, in the path of Your judgments, O LORD, we have waited for You; for Your name and for Your remembrance is the desire of our soul. I have set myself until morning; like a lion, so He breaks all my bones;[2] from day until night You make an end of me.

[1] These verses combine excerpts from three biblical narratives: Jacob blessing his grandsons (Genesis 48), Hagar and Ishmael in the wilderness (Genesis 21), and the binding of Isaac (Genesis 22). All three involve divine intervention averting death, making them powerful texts for healing prayers. Their arrangement creates a progression from individual blessing to national covenant, emphasizing both personal salvation and collective hope.

[2] This vivid metaphor from Hezekiah's prayer describes the intensity of physical suffering during serious illness. While shocking in its imagery, it authentically captures the experience of severe physical pain while acknowledging God's sovereignty even in suffering.

[i] Cf. Genesis 48:16 — This opening verse is drawn from Jacob's deathbed blessing to his grandsons. In Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as a powerful protective invocation, calling upon the same angelic protection that watched over Jacob to now guard the sick person. This connects the current suffering to ancestral protection and divine promises. | Cf. Genesis 21:17-18 — The verses about Hagar and Ishmael depict divine intervention at a moment of mortal danger. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, they serve as a powerful reminder that God hears the cries of those in distress and can provide salvation even in seemingly hopeless situations. The passage reassures the ill person that God is attentive to their suffering. | Cf. Genesis 22:12, 16-18 — These verses invoke God's promise to Abraham after the Akedah (binding of Isaac), a moment when death was averted through divine intervention. In Ma'avar Yabok, this serves both as a plea for similar intervention for the sick person and as a reminder of the covenant relationship between God and the Jewish people that transcends individual mortality.

[ii] This opening verse uses the unusual verb "tishpot" (תִּשְׁפֹּת) for establishing peace, which shares a root with "shofet" (judge). This creates a wordplay suggesting that God's judgment ultimately results in peace, an important theological concept in Ma'avar Yabok's approach to suffering.

[iii] The Hebrew phrase "tzakun lachash" (צָקוֹן לַחַשׁ) describes a whispered or silent prayer, literally "they poured out a whisper." This evokes the quiet, intimate prayers often offered at a sickbed.

[iv] This powerful metaphor comparing God to a lion breaking bones expresses the overwhelming physical pain of serious illness. In Hezekiah's original context, this refers to his near-fatal illness from which God eventually healed him.

Lord, by these things men live, and in all these is the life of my spirit; so You will restore me and revive me. For the grave cannot thank You, death cannot praise You;[1] those who go down to the pit cannot hope for Your truth. The living, the living, he shall praise You, as I do this day; the father shall make known Your truth to the children.[2] The LORD is ready to save me; therefore we will play my songs on stringed instruments[3] all the days of our life in the house of the LORD. Strengthen the weak hands, and make firm the feeble knees. O LORD, be gracious to us; we have waited for You. Be their arm every morning, our salvation also in the time of trouble. He gives power to the weak, and to those who have no might He increases strength. But those who wait on the LORD shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings like eagles,[4] they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint.

[1]This theological statement reflects the biblical view that death ends one's ability to actively praise God, which serves as an argument for healing and life extension. This contrasts with later Jewish mystical views (including elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok) that describe the soul's continued spiritual activity after death.

[2]This reference to intergenerational religious instruction connects to Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper preparation for death, which includes ensuring religious traditions are transmitted to future generations.

[3]Hezekiah's commitment to ongoing worship after his healing exemplifies the ideal response to divine deliverance—continued dedication to religious practice. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this represents the hope for recovery and renewed spiritual devotion.

[1]This famous image of spiritual renewal has profound relevance in Ma'avar Yabok's context, suggesting that even when physical healing doesn't occur, spiritual elevation remains possible through proper religious orientation toward suffering and death.

[i]The theological assertion that the dead cannot praise God is a recurring theme in Ma'avar Yabok. This biblical view is used to argue that healing allows continued divine service, though the book also incorporates later Jewish concepts of the soul's continued existence and activity after death.

[ii]This reference to fathers teaching children about God's faithfulness reflects Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper spiritual preparation for death, including passing on religious traditions to the next generation.

[iii]The Hebrew "ever" (אֵבֶר) refers specifically to the pinion or strong outer wing feathers of eagles. This metaphor of ascending like eagles has become one of the most beloved images of spiritual and physical renewal in biblical tradition.

[iv]Cf. Isaiah 26:12-13 — These verses appear in Isaiah's prayer for deliverance and express trust that God is ultimately the author of all human accomplishments. In Ma'avar Yabok, these verses serve as a reminder that even in illness, one should recognize God's hand in all things. | Cf. Isaiah 38:9-20 — Many of these verses come from King Hezekiah's prayer after his recovery from a life-threatening illness. This is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok as Hezekiah's experience represents the ideal model of illness, repentance, prayer, and divine healing. | Cf. Isaiah 35:3-4 — This verse about strengthening weak hands and feeble knees appears in a section of Isaiah that promises divine deliverance and healing. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as both a prayer for the sick person's recovery and an exhortation to caregivers to provide strength and support. | Cf. Isaiah 40:29-31 — These final verses about God giving strength to the weary are among the most beloved in Isaiah. In Ma'avar Yabok, they provide spiritual comfort by promising

O LORD, our Lord, how majestic is Your name in all the earth! You have heard the desire of the humble, O LORD; You will strengthen their heart, You will incline Your ear. I will praise the LORD according to His righteousness, and I will sing praise to the name of the LORD Most High. He heard my voice from His temple, and my cry before Him came to His ears. I will praise

[2]This verse expresses the hope for divine rescue from the brink of death, a central theme in Ma'avar Yabok's prayers for the sick. The Hebrew uses the metaphor of physical elevation (meromemi) from the gates of death, suggesting both physical healing and spiritual elevation.

[3]The repeated imagery of 'cords' (chevlei) creates a parallel between death, destruction, and Sheol (the underworld). This triple parallel emphasizes the comprehensive nature of the threat facing the ill person, who feels encircled by mortality from all sides.

divine empowerment even when physical strength fails, and suggest that waiting on God (prayer and faith) leads to spiritual renewal. | Cf. The Zohar — Ma'avar Yabok draws extensively on the Zohar in its understanding of illness and healing. The selection of these particular prophetic verses aligns with the Zoharic view that suffering can lead to spiritual elevation when approached with proper intention and prayer.

[v]This Hebrew heading identifies that what follows are verses from the Ketuvim (Writings), the third section of the Hebrew Bible. In Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical system, verses are organized by their scriptural source: Torah, Nevi'im (Prophets), and Ketuvim (Writings).

[i]The metaphor of the 'gates of death' (sha'arei mavet) appears throughout biblical literature, depicting death as a realm with entrances that one approaches in severe illness. This imagery would be particularly meaningful in Ma'avar Yabok's context of prayers for the critically ill who are seen as approaching these gates but hoping for divine rescue.

[ii]The Hebrew phrase 'chevlei mavet' (cords of death) is a powerful metaphor that appears in several psalms, depicting death as an entangling force that binds its victims. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this image resonates with the experience of the seriously ill, who may feel ensnared by their condition.

[iii]The image of God lighting one's lamp has special significance in Ma'avar Yabok, which elsewhere explores the kabbalistic significance of light and lamps, particularly connecting them to the divine name and the human soul.

510 לִי מָגֵן יִשְׁעֶךָ וִימִינְךָ תִסְעָדֵנִי וְעַנְוָתְךָ תַרְבֵּנִי: כִּי אֹרֶךְ יָמִים וּשְׁנוֹת חַיִּים וְשָׁלוֹם יוֹסִיפוּ לָךְ: [i]

You have given me the shield of Your salvation; Your right hand supports me, and Your gentleness makes me great.[1] For length of days and years of life and peace they will add to you.[2] 555R

ואח״כ יאמר[ii] למען יחלצון ידידיך וגו׳[iii] רפאני ה׳ וגו׳[iv] כל הכתוב למעלה[v] עד צורי וגואלי׳ [i ii]

After this, recite “That Your beloved ones may be delivered”[3] etc., “Heal me, O LORD”[4] etc., and all that is written above until “my Rock and my Redeemer.”[5]

[1]The Hebrew word translated as ‘gentleness’ (anvatecha) can also mean ‘Your humility’ or ‘Your condescension,’ suggesting God’s willingness to lower Himself to assist humans. This creates a beautiful paradox where divine humility leads to human exaltation.

[2]This concluding verse from Proverbs serves as a powerful benediction for the sick person, promising the very things that illness threatens to take away: longevity, vitality, and wellbeing. Its inclusion transforms the entire prayer sequence from lamentation to blessing.

[3]This is the opening of Psalm 60:7/108:7. In the context of Ma’avar Yabok, this verse takes on special significance as a prayer for the deliverance of the sick person from their suffering.

[4]This phrase from Jeremiah 17:14 is particularly appropriate in a healing prayer sequence. The full verse continues ‘and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved, for You are my praise.’

[1]These words (צורי וגואלי) conclude Psalm 19:15 and are used here to mark the endpoint of a prayer sequence. This common closing formula connects the person praying to divine strength and redemption.

[i]Cf. Book of Psalms — These psalm verses have been carefully selected and arranged for their themes of divine protection, deliverance from death, and thanksgiving for salvation. In Ma’avar Yabok, they serve as powerful prayers for the sick, connecting individual suffering with biblical expressions of distress and divine rescue. | Cf. Proverbs 3:2 — The compilation concludes with a promise from Proverbs about longevity, which is particularly meaningful in the context of prayers for healing the sick. | Cf. Ma’avar Yabok structure — This compilation of verses is part of the ‘Seder’ section of Ma’avar Yabok, specifically within the collection of verses from Writings (Ketuvim) that follows psalms in the liturgical sequence. These verses are arranged to create a cohesive prayer emphasizing themes of divine deliverance from death and thanksgiving for salvation. | Cf. Jewish tradition of biblical verse compilation — This passage exemplifies the Jewish practice of likkutei pesukim (compiled verses), where biblical verses are selected and arranged to form new liturgical prayers. Ma’avar Yabok employs this technique extensively, using verses that specifically address healing, divine protection, and salvation from death.

[ii]This is a liturgical instruction indicating the next step in the prayer sequence. ‘ואח״כ’ (ve-achar kach) means ‘and after this’ or ‘afterward,’ while ‘יאמר’ (yomar) means ‘he shall say’ or ‘one should recite.’

[iii]This is the beginning of a verse from Psalm 60:7/108:7 that means ‘That Your beloved ones may be delivered.’ The ‘וגו” (ve-gomer) is an abbreviation for ‘וגומר’ meaning ‘et cetera’ or ‘and so on,’ indicating that the reader should continue with the rest of this well-known verse.

[iv]This is the beginning of a verse from Jeremiah 17:14 that means ‘Heal me, O LORD.’ Again, ‘וגו” indicates that the reader should continue with the full verse.

[v]This phrase means ‘all that is written above,’ directing the reader to repeat text that appeared earlier in the prayer sequence.

[A]Or: "Third Sequence" — The term 'seder' in this context refers to a liturgical sequence or arrangement. While 'Order 3' is more literal and maintains consistency with the numbering system, 'Third Sequence' might better convey to modern readers that this is part of a series of structured prayer arrangements designed for specific situations.

[B]Or: "One should begin with "Please, O LORD, save us, etc." as written above in the first order" — This alternate uses an impersonal construction rather than a masculine third-person verb form, which might be preferable for a modern translation that aims for gender neutrality in liturgical instructions.

[C]Or: "after which he shall recite either Psalm 24, 25, 28, or 30" — This alternate is slightly more formal in its listing of the psalm options, using 'either' to introduce the list, which might better reflect the formal liturgical context.

[1]This biblical phrase emphasizes God as the source of both strength and joyful praise. In the context of illness, it suggests that divine power provides both the healing itself and the reason for thanksgiving afterward.

[vi]This phrase means 'until "my Rock and my Redeemer"' which are the concluding words of Psalm 19:15. This indicates where to stop when reciting the previously mentioned prayers.

[vii]Cf. Psalm 60:7/108:7 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is repurposed as a healing prayer, asking God to deliver the sick person from their suffering. The biblical context involves God delivering His beloved people, and here it's applied individually to the sick person as one of God's beloved. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This direct plea for healing from Jeremiah is particularly appropriate in the context of prayers for the sick. In Ma'avar Yabok, biblical verses are carefully selected for their healing properties, and this verse explicitly requests both healing and salvation from God. | Cf. Psalm 19:15 — These words serve as a standard closing formula in Jewish prayers. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, they provide a fitting conclusion to prayers for the sick by connecting the sufferer to divine strength (Rock) and redemption, whether through healing or through a peaceful transition in death.

[i]This heading marks the third of eight structured prayer sequences (sedarim) in Ma'avar Yabok designed for healing the sick and comforting the dying. Like the other seven sequences, it follows a standardized structure while offering different psalm options.

[ii]This refers to the standardized opening prayer that begins each of the eight prayer sequences (sedarim) in Ma'avar Yabok's 'Seder' section. Rather than repeating this lengthy opening each time, the author directs readers back to where it first appears.

[iii]These are abbreviated references to psalm numbers using Hebrew letter numerals: כ״ד = 24, כ״ה = 25, כ״ח = 28, ל׳ = 30. The author gives options for different psalms that would be appropriate in this context.

[iv]This phrase "My strength and song is the LORD" comes from the Song at the Sea (Exodus 15:2), recited after Israel's miraculous deliverance at the Red Sea. It represents divine salvation from peril, making it particularly appropriate in prayers for healing.

[v]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Seder section — This instruction is part of the third liturgical order (Seder Gimel) in Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer sequences for the sick and dying. It demonstrates how the author created a systematic framework where each order follows the same opening formula but then offers options for different psalms appropriate to various situations of illness. | Cf. Exodus 15:2 — This biblical phrase from Exodus 15:2 is taken from the triumphant Song at the Sea, making it particularly appropriate in a healing context. It represents divine deliverance from peril and the joy of salvation, offering hope to the ill person while connecting their individual situation to the broader narrative of Israel's redemption.

(Psalm 25) Of David. To You, O LORD, I lift up my

[A] Or: "Who may ascend the mountain of the LORD? And who may stand in His holy place?" — The Hebrew verbs could be translated with 'may' rather than 'shall' to better convey the sense of permission or qualification rather than futurity. This alternative emphasizes the psalm's focus on who is worthy to approach the divine presence.

[B] Or: "One with innocent hands and a pure heart" — The Hebrew נְקִי (n'ki) can be rendered as 'innocent' rather than 'clean,' which might better capture the moral dimension implied in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, where spiritual purity before death is emphasized.

[1] This musical notation appears twice in this psalm. In the context of prayers for the sick, it might indicate moments of pause for reflection or deeper contemplation on the divine sovereignty that governs both life and death.

[2] The Hebrew term עִזּוּז (izzuz) for 'strong' is an intensive form that emphasizes God's supreme power, particularly relevant for prayers seeking divine intervention in illness.

[vi] While many psalms begin with "A psalm of David" (מזמור לדוד), this one reverses the order to "Of David. A psalm" (לדוד מזמור), which some rabbinic commentators interpret to mean that David was divinely inspired before composing this particular psalm.

[i] This question about who may ascend God's mountain has special significance in Ma'avar Yabok's context, as it parallels the book's central concern with who may successfully ascend to higher spiritual realms after death.

[ii] This imagery of gates lifting their heads to admit the King of glory has been interpreted in Jewish mystical tradition as referring to the various celestial gates through which a soul must pass in its ascent after death.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Seder section — This psalm was selected for the third liturgical order (Seder Gimel) of Ma'avar Yabok as appropriate for the sick and dying because of its themes of divine sovereignty, moral purity, and the hope of ascending to God's holy place. These themes would provide comfort to the ill person by emphasizing the holiness required to approach God and the hope of ultimately standing in the divine presence. | Cf. Zohar — Within the kabbalistic framework of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm would be understood as describing not just who may physically ascend to the Temple in Jerusalem, but which souls may ascend through the spiritual worlds after death. The 'clean hands and pure heart' represent the spiritual purification necessary for the soul's elevation, while the 'King of glory' represents the divine presence the soul encounters in higher realms.

[A] Or: "My eyes are ever toward the LORD, for He will extract my feet from the snare" — This alternate translation emphasizes the imagery of divine rescue from a trap or snare, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's view of illness as a form of spiritual entrapment from which one needs divine extraction.

[1] The Hebrew verb 'essa' literally means 'I will lift/raise' and creates a vivid image of the soul being elevated toward God, resonating with Ma'avar Yabok's focus on the soul's journey and elevation.
[2] In Ma'avar Yabok's mystical framework, these 'enemies' would be understood on multiple levels: as human adversaries, as physical illnesses, and as spiritual forces (like the Angel of Death or negative spiritual entities called 'chitzonim' or 'external forces').
[3] This verse reinforces a central theological principle in Ma'avar Yabok that suffering and illness serve as divine instruction, guiding sinners back to the proper path through the experience of physical affliction.
[4] The Hebrew word 'sod' (secret) is particularly significant in Jewish mystical tradition, where it represents the deepest, esoteric level of Torah interpretation. In Ma'avar Yabok, this would suggest that proper spiritual preparation grants access to divine mysteries, especially relevant when facing mortality.

[iv] The psalm begins with the soul's lifting or raising toward God, a theme particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of preparing the soul for its ultimate ascent during illness and death.
[i] This plea for God to forget youthful transgressions aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on confession (vidui) before death as a means of spiritual purification. In the book's kabbalistic framework, such confession literally removes spiritual blemishes.
[ii] The term 'sod' (secret or mystery) has special significance in Jewish mystical tradition, referring to the deepest, esoteric level of Torah interpretation. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this would suggest that those who properly fear God receive special spiritual insight, particularly relevant when approaching death.

Do not drag me away with the wicked and with evildoers, who speak peace with their neighbors while evil is in their hearts.[4] Give them according to [A] Or: "The distresses of my heart have grown great" — This alternative more directly conveys the intensification of suffering, which would resonate with the experience of progressive illness as described in Ma'avar Yabok.

[1] The psalm concludes by moving from individual to communal concerns, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's understanding that proper spiritual practice during illness creates merit not only for the individual but for the entire community.

[2] The Hebrew uses two different verbs with similar meaning: 'אַל־תֶּחֱרַשׁ' (do not be deaf/silent) and 'פֶּן־תֶּחֱשֶׁה' (lest you be silent). This repetition emphasizes the psalmist's urgent need for divine response, reflecting the anxiety of someone seriously ill seeking assurance of God's attention.

[3] In Jewish tradition, 'the pit' (בּוֹר) represents both the physical grave and Sheol, the shadowy underworld realm of the dead. In Ma'avar Yabok, this image would resonate particularly with those facing terminal illness, expressing fear of joining the dead without divine intervention.

[4] This description of duplicitous speech may seem unexpected in a healing prayer, but in Ma'avar Yabok's context, it distinguishes the sincere prayers of the ill person from insincere religious practices. The book emphasizes that genuine confession and prayer are crucial for spiritual healing.

[i] The psalm concludes with a collective prayer for all Israel rather than just the individual, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's understanding that proper spiritual practice during illness and death benefits not only the individual but the entire community.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This psalm appears in the third liturgical order (Seder Gimel) of Ma'avar Yabok as one of several psalms recommended for recitation by or for the sick. Its themes of divine guidance, plea for forgiveness, and trust in divine protection make it particularly appropriate for those facing illness or approaching death. | Cf. Psalm 25 — Psalm 25 is an acrostic psalm (though with some irregularities) arranged by the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. In Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as a prayer of supplication that combines confession of sin with expressions of trust in divine mercy and guidance. | Cf. Talmud — The Talmud recommends reciting prayers for divine protection when traveling on dangerous roads. The imagery in Psalm 25 of God leading one on proper paths and freeing feet from snares would resonate with the book's metaphorical understanding of illness and death as a journey requiring divine guidance.

[iii] The phrase 'those who descend to the pit' refers to the dead or those approaching death. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this resonates with the book's focus on the transition between life and death, with the psalmist expressing fear of joining those who have died without divine intervention.

[iv] The physical gesture of lifting hands toward the sanctuary represents both a ritual prayer position and, in kabbalistic understanding, creates a spiritual channel connecting the worshipper to divine realms. Ma'avar Yabok emphasizes the importance of proper physical gestures during prayer for the sick.

[1] The Hebrew term 'מִשִּׁירִי' literally means 'from my song,' suggesting that praise emerges naturally from the experience of divine salvation. In Ma'avar Yabok, song and prayer are understood as spiritual remedies that both express gratitude and continue the healing process.

[2] The term 'מְשִׁיחוֹ' (His anointed) historically referred to the king of Israel but gained messianic connotations over time. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this verse would be understood as affirming that God provides special protection to the righteous, particularly relevant for a seriously ill person seeking divine favor.

[3] This psalm appears in the third liturgical order (Seder Gimel) of Ma'avar Yabok, specifically selected for recitation for the sick. Its themes of healing, divine rescue from the grave, and transformation of mourning into joy make it particularly relevant for those seeking recovery from illness.

[4] The image of being drawn up (as from a well) creates a powerful metaphor for recovery from illness, especially when paired with the subsequent reference to Sheol (the realm of the dead). In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this symbolizes both physical healing and spiritual elevation.

[i] This verse reflects the theological framework of Ma'avar Yabok that understanding divine purpose in suffering is crucial. Those who fail to perceive God's works lack spiritual insight and face destruction, while the sick person who recognizes divine purpose in illness can find meaning and salvation.

[ii] The request that God 'shepherd and carry them forever' connects to Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on divine care continuing beyond death. The verb 'נְשָׂאֵם' (carry them) evokes the image of being lifted up, which in the context of illness suggests both physical recovery and spiritual elevation.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's Seder Section — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, Psalm 28 serves as a powerful prayer for the ill, combining urgent pleas for divine attention with expressions of trust in divine protection. The opening plea 'do not be deaf to me' and comparison to 'those who descend to the pit' would resonate powerfully with a seriously ill person facing the possibility of death. | Cf. Talmud Bavli — The gesture of lifting hands toward the sanctuary in verse 2 parallels ritual gestures during prayer for the sick in Jewish tradition, including turning toward Jerusalem/the sanctuary. In Ma'avar Yabok, this physical orientation during prayer is given mystical significance as creating a channel for divine healing energy. | Cf. Zohar — The confidence expressed in verse 6 'Blessed is the LORD, for He has heard the voice of my supplications' aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic teaching that properly offered prayers penetrate the heavens and receive divine response, especially during illness when the Divine Presence (Shekhinah) hovers near the sick person.

(תורה) עָזִּי וְזִמְרָת יָהּ[i] וַיְהִי לִי

(Torah) The LORD is my strength and song,[6] and He

[A]Or: "O LORD, You have raised my soul from the depths of the grave" — This translation makes the metaphor of rescue from death more explicit for modern readers who might not recognize the significance of 'Sheol' as the realm of the dead. It preserves the vertical imagery of being lifted up from below, which is important to the psalm's movement.

[B]Or: "You have transformed my lamentation into celebratory dancing for me" — This translation emphasizes the complete transformation from deepest grief to highest joy, highlighting the dramatic nature of divine healing that is central to Ma'avar Yabok's understanding of recovery from illness as spiritual redemption.

[A]Or: "So that my soul may sing praise to You and not be silent" — The Hebrew כָּבוֹד (kavod/glory) is sometimes interpreted as referring specifically to the soul or innermost being in contexts of praise. This translation makes the metaphysical dimension more explicit, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's frequent emphasis on the soul's relationship with God.

[1]This verse would be especially meaningful in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical context, as it portrays recovery from serious illness as a rescue from death itself, reinforcing the book's view of healing as divine redemption.

[2]This verse aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework that presents suffering as temporary divine correction, while healing reflects God's essential attribute of mercy. The contrast between momentary anger and enduring favor offers comfort to the sick.

[3]The concept of divine concealment (hester panim) is significant in Jewish mysticism. In Ma'avar Yabok, illness is often portrayed as a temporary concealment of divine favor that can be reversed through proper prayer and repentance.

[4]This rhetorical question forms a central theological argument in Ma'avar Yabok's approach to healing prayers: that God benefits more from the continued life and praise of His servants than from their death. This becomes a basis for petitioning God for recovery.

[1]The psalm concludes with a commitment to eternal gratitude, which in Ma'avar Yabok's context serves both as a promise from the sick person and as a reminder that recovery from illness creates an obligation for continued devotion and thanksgiving.

[2]The Hebrew phrase 'ozi v'zimrat Yah' is complex and has been variously translated. Some

[i]Cf. Zohar — The psalm's journey from illness to healing parallels the Zoharic teaching that suffering can lead to spiritual elevation when properly responded to with prayer. Ma'avar Yabok incorporates this psalm within its healing liturgy to activate this spiritual principle. | Cf. Tal-scholars understand it as 'the LORD is my strength and protection' or 'the LORD is my strength and might.' The translation here follows the traditional understanding found in most Jewish liturgy.

[3]The phrase 'congregation of peoples' (k'hal amim) suggests both numerical increase and the formation of a structured community. This blessing, originally given to Jacob, connects individual healing and prosperity to communal flourishing.

mud — The psalm's affirmation that God's anger lasts only a moment while His favor brings life aligns with the Talmudic concept that suffering is temporary and purposeful, ultimately leading to purification and healing when properly received. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This psalm's inclusion in Seder Gimel reflects its thematic appropriateness for healing prayers, as it moves from illness to recovery, from divine concealment to revelation, and from mourning to dancing—mirroring the desired transformation in the sick person's condition. | Cf. Isaiah 38 — Both Psalm 30 and Hezekiah's prayer emphasize that the dead cannot praise God, using this theological argument as a basis for requesting healing. Ma'avar Yabok incorporates both texts in its healing liturgy, reinforcing the idea that recovery from illness allows continued divine service.

[ii]This opening phrase from the Song at the Sea (Exodus 15:2) is particularly significant in healing contexts. The word 'zimrat' (song/praise) shares its root with 'zamir' (pruning), suggesting that praise of God both expresses strength and cuts away spiritual obstacles to healing.

[i]The instruction to 'remain silent' or 'hold your peace' presents a theological approach to healing where human action sometimes gives way to divine intervention. This creates a balance with the other verses that emphasize obedience and active service.

[ii]God's self-identification as 'your healer' establishes divine healing as an essential divine attribute rather than an occasional action. This title appears in a context linking healing to obedience, a connection maintained throughout biblical and rabbinic literature.

[iii]Cf. Exodus 15:2-3 — These verses are particularly significant in a healing context as they emphasize God's role as a deliverer and protector. The selection connects physical healing to the paradigmatic redemption from Egypt, suggesting that current affliction can likewise end in salvation. | Cf. Exodus 14:14 — This verse emphasizes divine intervention requiring human passivity, suggesting that healing ultimately comes from God while humans must trust in divine protection. | Cf. Exodus 15:26 — This verse directly addresses divine healing, establishing God's self-identification as 'your healer' (רֹפְאֶךָ). It connects physical health to spiritual obedience, a central theme in Ma'avar Yabok's approach to illness. | Cf. Genesis 28:3-4 — This blessing invokes divine fertility and abundance, connecting physical well-being to divine blessing. The mention of becoming 'a congregation of peoples' suggests communal dimensions of blessing that extend beyond individual healing. | Cf. Exodus 20:21 — This verse connects divine blessing to places where God's name is invoked, suggesting that prayer and divine invocation in sacred contexts facilitates healing and blessing. | Cf. Exodus 23:25 — This verse directly links divine service to physical well-being, promising both sustenance (blessed bread and water) and health (removal of sickness), reinforcing Ma'avar Yabok's connection between spiritual practice and physical healing.

[A] Or: "do not be anxious" — The Hebrew word תִּשְׁתָּע (tishta) is relatively uncommon and has connotations of anxiety or distress. While 'dismayed' captures the emotional state well, 'anxious' might be more accessible to modern readers while preserving the meaning.

[B] Or: "I strengthen you, I help you, I uphold you" — The Hebrew uses perfect tense verbs that can be translated either as future or present tense depending on context. In this passage of divine reassurance, present tense might better convey the immediacy of God's ongoing support rather than just a future promise.

[C] Or: "for how could it be profaned?" — The Hebrew phrase is elliptical, not explicitly mentioning 'My name' though this is implied from context. A more literal translation preserves this ambiguity while maintaining the rhetorical force of the question.

[1] The promise to remove sickness appears in a context of serving God and receiving blessed sustenance, establishing a holistic approach to health that includes spiritual practice, proper nutrition, and divine intervention—all themes developed extensively in Ma'avar Yabok.

[2] This opening verse establishes an intimate, physical metaphor of divine support—God holding the person's hand like a parent with a child or a guide helping someone through difficult terrain. This imagery would be especially comforting to someone experiencing illness.

[3] The Hebrew construction is ambiguous about whether God is restraining anger 'for you' (beneficially) or 'from you' (hiding it). I've chosen 'from you' as it better connects with the following phrase about not cutting the person off.

[4] The image of God's 'righteous right hand' combines two powerful biblical motifs: divine righteousness (moral perfection) and the right hand (strength and favor). For the ill person, this promises both moral and physical support from God's perfect power.

[i] This phrase from Isaiah 42:1 begins a prophetic passage about God's servant that was traditionally interpreted by Jews as referring to Israel collectively, while Christians later interpreted it as referring to Jesus. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, it offers reassurance that God upholds those who are weak or suffering.

[ii] The Hebrew verb אֶחֱטָם (echtom) is rare and appears only in Isaiah 48:9. It likely derives from a root meaning 'to bridle' or 'to muzzle,' creating a powerful image of God restraining His anger as one might bridle a horse.

[iii] This powerful metaphor compares the face to flint stone, expressing resolute determination and unshakable confidence in divine support despite opposition. In the context of illness, it offers a model of spiritual resilience for the suffering person.

me great.[A] For by You I can run against a troop, and by my God I can leap over a wall. I will wash

[A] Or: "and Your humility exalts me" — The Hebrew term ענוה (anavah) can refer to humility or gentleness. In this context, it creates a paradox where God's humility (willingness to lower Himself to help humans) results in human exaltation. This alternate translation preserves this theological paradox that would be familiar to kabbalistic readers.

[1] The Hebrew metaphor of joy being 'upon their heads' suggests joy as a crown or visible manifestation, creating a striking contrast with the illness or suffering the person might currently be experiencing. This offers hope that their current condition will be replaced by visible, permanent joy.

[2] This verse from Psalm 21:4 was originally about the king but is repurposed in Ma'avar Yabok as a prayer for the sick person's longevity. The phrase 'forever and ever' would be understood as hyperbole when applied to earthly life but also as an allusion to eternal life in the World to Come.

[3] In the kabbalistic context of Ma'avar Yabok, this crown imagery would be interpreted as the divine light that surrounds and protects the head of the righteous, particularly during illness. Crowns frequently symbolize spiritual attainment and divine protection in Jewish mystical literature.

[i] This poetic closing phrase about sorrow and sighing fleeing away would be particularly comforting to those in physical pain or emotional distress, offering a vision of complete restoration where all suffering is permanently removed.

[ii] Cf. Isaiah — This passage compiles verses from multiple chapters in Isaiah that focus on divine comfort, protection, and redemption. These verses were selected for their reassuring themes of God strengthening the weak, helping the fearful, and promising ultimate redemption. In Ma'avar Yabok, they serve as divine assurances for the sick person, offering spiritual comfort through prophetic promises of divine support and eventual salvation. | Cf. Seder Te'fillah (Prayer liturgy) — The compiler of Ma'avar Yabok adopted the traditional liturgical practice of stringing together thematically related biblical verses to create a spiritually potent prayer sequence. This method reflects the Jewish understanding that biblical verses retain their spiritual power when recited, especially in moments of vulnerability like illness.

[iii] The image of 'leaping over a wall' was particularly meaningful in the context of illness, suggesting that with divine help, the sufferer could overcome seemingly insurmountable obstacles to recovery.

[iv] This reference to ritual washing connects physical purification with spiritual cleansing, a theme that appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok's approach to healing. In kabbalistic interpretation, physical actions like washing create corresponding spiritual effects.

[A] Or: "in the assemblies I will praise the LORD" — The term מַקְהֲלִים (makhelim) refers to gatherings or assemblies, while the verb אֲבָרֵךְ (avarech) can mean either 'bless' or 'praise' depending on context. This alternate translation emphasizes the public, communal nature of thanksgiving after healing, which would be relevant to Ma'avar Yabok's focus on both individual and communal responses to illness and recovery.

[B] Or: "nor abandon me, O God of my deliverance" — The term ישע (yesha) encompasses both salvation in the spiritual sense and physical deliverance/rescue. In the context of prayers for healing in Ma'avar Yabok, emphasizing the physical 'deliverance' aspect might better reflect the immediate concerns of someone who is ill.

[1] The phrase 'land of the living' (בְּאֶרֶץ חַיִּים) has multiple interpretations in Jewish tradition. In the immediate context of prayers for healing, it refers to this world and continued physical life. However, in Ma'avar Yabok's eschatological framework, it also alludes to the World to Come where souls experience eternal life.

[2] This concluding exhortation to 'wait for the LORD' appears twice for emphasis, creating a pow-

[i] The phrase 'to behold the pleasantness of the LORD' would be interpreted in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework as referring to the mystic vision of divine light, which was believed to have healing properties. This connects the physical healing sought through these prayers with spiritual illumination.

[ii] Cf. Book of Psalms — These verses have been compiled as part of a prayer sequence for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok. The selections focus on divine protection, healing, and spiritual comfort, emphasizing God's power to sustain life and the psalmist's desire to dwell in God's presence. The compiler has intentionally selected verses that transition from expressions of confidence in God's protection to direct petitions for divine intervention and guidance, concluding with encouragement to wait hopefully for divine deliverance. | Cf. Zohar — Ma'avar Yabok's selection of these verses reflects its kabbalistic understanding that reciting scriptural passages with proper intention activates spiritual channels of healing. The references to God's gentleness (וַעֲנָוָתְךָ) and right hand (וימינך) would be understood as references to specific divine attributes (sefirot) through which healing flows, particularly Chesed (loving-kindness) and Tiferet (harmony).

erful conclusion to this prayer compilation. For the sick person, it encourages patient endurance during illness with confident expectation of divine intervention.

[1] The original Hebrew uses the third-person impersonal form 'יאמר' (he shall say), which is a standard format for liturgical instructions. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's function as a manual for those performing deathbed rituals.

[2] This phrase from Psalms 19:15 serves as the standard conclusion to the prayer sequences in Ma'avar Yabok. The metaphors of God as both 'Rock' (stability, protection) and 'Redeemer' (rescuer, liberator) are particularly appropriate in the context of prayers for the sick and dying.

[3] This simple header marks the beginning of the fourth structured liturgical sequence in Ma'avar Yabok. Each of the eight 'sedarim' (orders) follows a similar pattern: opening with prayers beginning with 'Ana Hashem hoshiah na' (Please, O LORD, save us), continuing with specific psalms (in this case including Psalm 31 with its important verse 'Into Your hand I commit my spirit'), followed by collections of biblical verses organized by source (Torah, Prophets, Writings), and concluding with standardized healing formulas.

[i] This introduces a standard prayer formula beginning with a verse from Psalms 60:7/108:7. The abbreviation "וגו׳" (etc.) indicates that the user should recite the complete verse, which would have been well-known to the intended audience.

[ii] This refers to Jeremiah 17:14, "Heal me, O LORD, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved, for You are my praise." The abbreviated form assumes the reader knows the complete verse.

[iii] This instruction refers back to a previously detailed prayer sequence, showing that Ma'avar Yabok was designed as a practical manual with recurring elements that did not need to be repeated in full each time.

[iv] Cf. Psalms 60:7 — This verse from Psalms is used as the opening of a prayer sequence. In the original psalm, it expresses a plea for God to save His beloved people. In Ma'avar Yabok, it's repurposed as part of a healing prayer for the sick, invoking God's special relationship with His people as grounds for divine intervention and healing. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This direct appeal for divine healing from Jeremiah forms a centerpiece of the prayer sequence for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok. The prophet's personal plea for healing is repurposed as a universal prayer appropriate for any sick person, emphasizing that true healing comes only from God. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This line shows that Ma'avar Yabok was structured as a practical manual with repeating elements. Rather than repeating identical prayer sequences multiple times, the author provides detailed instructions once and then refers back to them. The reference to 'my Rock and my Redeemer' (from Psalms 19:15) indicates where the repeated sequence should end.

[v] This is a section header for the fourth liturgical sequence (Seder Dalet) in Ma'avar Yabok's collection of eight prayer orders for healing the sick and comforting the dying.

[vi] Cf. Psalm 31 — Psalm 31 is specifically included in the fourth liturgical order because it contains the verse 'Into Your hand I commit my spirit,' which is considered especially appropriate for the dying as an expression of surrendering one's soul to divine care. | Cf. Ana Hashem hoshiah na — The phrase 'Please, O LORD, save us' serves as a standardized opening for all eight prayer orders, creating ritual continuity throughout the book's liturgical framework for healing the sick and dying. | Cf. Memory Note #3042 — The section header 'Seder Dalet' (Order Four) identifies this as the fourth of eight structured prayer sequences, each following a consistent pattern: opening with 'Ana Hashem,' continuing with specific psalms, followed by biblical verses organized by source, and concluding with standardized healing formulas.

(Psalm 31) For the Chief Musician. A Psalm of David. In You, O LORD, I have taken refuge; let me never be put to shame; deliver me in Your righteousness. Incline Your ear to me, rescue me quickly; be to me a rock of strength, a fortress to save me. For You are my rock and my stronghold; for Your name's sake, lead me and guide me. Release me from the net they have hidden for me, for You are my strength. Into Your hand I commit my spirit;[A] You have redeemed me, O LORD, God of truth. I hate those who revere worthless idols,[B] but I trust in the LORD. I

[A] Or: "Into Your hand I entrust my soul" — The Hebrew "ruchi" (רוּחִי) can be translated as either "my spirit" or "my soul." In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which focuses on the soul's transition at death, "soul" might better capture the intended meaning in this deathbed prayer context.

[B] Or: "I despise those who observe empty vanities" — "Havlei-shav" (הַבְלֵי־שָׁוְא) could refer not just to literal idols but to any worthless or empty practices. A broader translation might better capture the range of meaningless pursuits contrasted with true faith in God.

[1] The original text uses the verb 'יתחיל' (begin) in the third person singular, following the instructional style common throughout Ma'avar Yabok, which provides directions to those caring for the sick and dying.

[2] This refers to the standardized opening prayer that begins each of the eight liturgical sequences in the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok. The 'etc.' (וגו׳) indicates that the reader should continue with the complete formula as previously specified.

[3] This phrase begins a collection of biblical verses from Torah that follow a pattern established throughout Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences, where verses are organized by their source (Torah, Prophets, Writings) to create comprehensive spiritual resources for healing.

[i] This refers to the standardized opening prayer formula that begins each of the eight prayer sequences (sedarim) in Ma'avar Yabok. Rather than repeating the full text, the author simply refers readers back to where it first appears in Order 1.

[ii] This instruction provides options for which psalm to recite as part of the fourth order (Seder Dalet) of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok. The numbers refer to specific psalms that are considered especially appropriate for those who are ill.

[iii] This is the opening phrase of a prayer beginning with words from Deuteronomy 4:31. It continues a pattern seen throughout Ma'avar Yabok of organizing prayers that begin with verses from Torah, followed by verses from Prophets, and then Writings.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Seder Section — This instruction for the fourth order demonstrates Ma'avar Yabok's systematic approach to prayer for the sick, creating a comprehensive yet flexible framework that allows for adaptation to different situations while maintaining a consistent structure. | Cf. Psalms 31, 38, 40, 71 — The selected psalms share themes of physical affliction, divine protection, and confidence in ultimate divine salvation—making them particularly appropriate for those experiencing serious illness. Their inclusion shows Ma'avar Yabok's careful curation of biblical texts as spiritual medicine. | Cf. Deuteronomy 4:31 — Beginning the prayer with this verse emphasizes God's compassionate nature even in times of suffering, setting a theological foundation that illness and judgment are ultimately expressions of divine love rather than abandonment.

my years in sighing; my strength fails because of my who see me outside flee from me. I am forgotten like a dead person, out of mind; I have become like a

[A] Or: "You conceal them in the secret place of Your face" — A more literal translation that preserves the striking Hebrew imagery of God's face having a "secret place" or "hiding place" where the faithful can take refuge.

[1] The psalm's movement from distress to confidence in divine mercy reflects Ma'avar Yabok's therapeutic approach to prayer for the sick, which typically progresses from acknowledging suffering to affirming trust in divine protection and healing.

[2] Sheol (שְׁאוֹל) refers to the abode of the dead in Hebrew Scripture. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this reference to the silence of the wicked in Sheol contrasts with the book's kabbalistic view that the righteous dead continue spiritual activities in the afterlife.

[i] The Hebrew term "merukhsei-ish" is somewhat obscure and has been variously interpreted. It likely refers to conspiracies, plots, or schemes of people against others. In the context of this psalm, it refers to human machinations against the righteous.

[ii] "In a besieged city" could be interpreted either literally (referring to David being surrounded by enemies in a physical city) or metaphorically (representing the psalmist's feeling of being surrounded by troubles and enemies on all sides).

[iii] The Hebrew term "b'chofzi" denotes a state of alarm, panic, or haste. It expresses the psalmist's emotional state when feeling cut off from divine protection.

(Psalm 38) A psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.[1] O LORD, do not rebuke me in Your anger, 805R nor discipline me in Your wrath. For Your arrows have pierced me, and Your hand has come down upon me. There is no soundness in my flesh because of Your indignation; there is no peace in my bones be- 810R cause of my sin. For my iniquities have gone over my head; like a heavy burden,[2] they are too heavy for me. My wounds grow foul and fester because of my foolishness. I am bent and bowed down greatly;[A] all

[A] Or: "I am twisted and brought very low" — The term נַעֲוֵיתִי has connotations of being twisted or distorted, which could better convey the extreme physical deformity that illness was believed to cause. This alternate translation might better capture the visceral nature of the suffering described in Ma'avar Yabok's context.

[1] This psalm appears in the fourth liturgical order (Seder Dalet) of Ma'avar Yabok as one of several psalms specifically recommended for recitation by or for the sick. Its themes of physical suffering attributed to sin, social isolation during illness, and urgent pleas for divine intervention make it particularly relevant for those experiencing serious illness.

[2] This psalm portrays sin as a crushing weight that manifests as physical illness, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework where suffering serves as divine correction for spiritual failings.

[i] This phrase is challenging to translate. It literally means "and repays in full to the one who acts with pride/arrogance." It contrasts the protection of the faithful with the punishment of the proud.

[ii] Cf. Zohar, Parshat Vayechi — Ma'avar Yabok draws on the Zohar's interpretation of "Into Your hand I commit my spirit" as the quintessential deathbed declaration, representing the soul's willing submission to divine custody at death. The book recommends this verse as a focus for meditation during the dying process. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Seder 4 — This psalm, particularly verse 6, is central to Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequence for the dying person. The book instructs attendants to help the dying recite this verse as their final words if possible, seeing it as the ideal expression of surrender to God at death. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Berakhot 5a — Ma'avar Yabok draws a parallel between sleep and death, both being times when one entrusts one's soul to divine keeping. The practice of reciting Psalm 31:6 before sleep prepares one for the ultimate surrender at death.

[iii] "To bring to remembrance" may refer to this psalm's use in memorial offerings or as a prayer to make God remember the supplicant in mercy. This connection to remembrance makes it particularly appropriate in Ma'avar Yabok's context, where it serves as a prayer for the sick seeking divine attention.

[iv] The metaphor of divine "arrows" piercing the body parallels Ma'avar Yabok's understanding of illness as divinely sent for spiritual correction rather than random misfortune.

[v] The Hebrew "ein metom" (no soundness/wholeness) is used twice in this psalm, emphasizing the totality of the physical affliction, which would resonate with the severely ill for whom Ma'avar Yabok was intended.

[vi] The graphic description of wounds becoming foul and festering uses verbs (הִבְאִישׁוּ "became putrid" and נָמַקּוּ "dissolve/decay") that would be particularly meaningful in the context of severe illness, connecting physical corruption with spiritual failings.

me wrongfully are numerous.[3] Those who repay evil for good oppose me because I pursue what is good.
Do not forsake me, O LORD; O my God, do not

[A] Or: "I am grown cold and completely pulverized" — The term נְפוּגוֹתִי literally refers to growing cold or becoming numb, while נִדְכֵּיתִי suggests being crushed to powder. This more literal translation might better capture the physical sensation of life-force diminishing that would resonate with Ma'avar Yabok's understanding of the dying process.

[B] Or: "I roar from the groaning of my heart" — The verb שָׁאַגְתִּי literally means 'I roar' (like a lion), suggesting a more intense vocalization than merely groaning. This alternate translation conveys the visceral, almost animal-like suffering that severe illness can produce, which fits Ma'avar Yabok's realistic portrayal of the dying experience.

[1] The Hebrew term "koder" (קֹדֶר) conveys a state of being darkened or in shadow, suggesting both physical weakness and spiritual darkness—a dual condition that Ma'avar Yabok seeks to address through its integrated approach to physical and spiritual healing.

[2] The Hebrew term "nega" (נִגְעִי) for "affliction" can also refer specifically to a disease or plague, particularly those described in Leviticus. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this verse would be read as a critique of those who abandon the sick rather than fulfilling the mitzvah of visiting them.

[3] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these enemies might be interpreted both literally as human opponents and metaphorically as the spiritual forces or illness itself that afflicts the body. The book often portrays illness using martial imagery of battle against negative forces.

[i] This verse describing social isolation during illness reflects a reality often experienced by the severely ill, and contrasts with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper visitation of the sick as a sacred duty.

[ii] The psalmist's self-description as being like a deaf and mute person represents a posture of silent acceptance of divine judgment, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on accepting illness as divine correction.

[iii] The Hebrew "letzela nakhon" (ready to fall/limp) evokes physical frailty and the sense of being on the verge of collapse, a powerful expression of the precarious state between life and death that Ma'avar Yabok addresses.

(Psalm 40) For the choir director. A psalm of David. I waited patiently for the LORD; He inclined to me and heard my cry. He lifted me out of the pit of destruction, from the miry clay,[A] and set my feet upon a rock, making my steps secure.[2] He put a new song in my mouth, a hymn of praise to our God; many will see and fear and trust in the LORD.[3] Blessed is the man who makes the LORD his trust, who does not turn to the proud or to those who follow falsehood.[4] Many, O LORD my 845R 850R

[A] Or: "He brought me up from the pit of tumultuous noise, from the muddy mire" — This alternate translation preserves the acoustic dimension of 'sha'on' (שָׁאוֹן) which includes the sense of roaring noise or tumult, and might better capture the chaotic experience of serious illness that the psalm metaphorically describes.

[1] The psalm's conclusion with this direct invocation of God as the source of salvation reflects Ma'avar Yabok's central theological premise that true healing comes ultimately from God, even when human medical intervention is employed.

[2] The Hebrew phrase 'konen ashurai' (כּוֹנֵן אֲשֻׁרָי) conveys not just stability but divinely established direction. For those using this psalm during illness, it offers hope of both physical recovery and spiritual reorientation.

[3] This suggests that the individual's healing becomes a public testimony that benefits the broader community. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this reflects how proper spiritual care for the sick can have wider spiritual impact beyond the individual.

[4] The Hebrew terms 'rehavim' (רְהָבִים) and 'satei kazav' (שָׂטֵי כָזָב) refer to those who trust in false powers or deceptive remedies. In the context of illness, this warns against seeking healing through spiritually questionable means rather than divine assistance.

[i] The psalm concludes with an urgent plea for divine assistance, using the word "teshuat" (salvation), which encompasses both physical healing and spiritual deliverance—perfectly aligned with Ma'avar Yabok's holistic approach to illness.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Siftei Tzedek — Psalm 38's description of friends and relatives standing aloof from the sufferer (verses 11-12) would be read as a warning in Ma'avar Yabok's context, reinforcing the book's emphasis on proper visitation of the sick (bikur cholim) as a sacred obligation. | Cf. Zohar — Psalm 38's attribution of physical suffering to divine judgment aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework from the Zohar, where illness serves as spiritual correction rather than mere punishment. This psalm's theological perspective would be interpreted within Ma'avar Yabok's larger framework where suffering serves to purify the soul. | Cf. Job — Unlike Job, who maintains his innocence despite suffering, Psalm 38 acknowledges sin as the cause of affliction. Ma'avar Yabok integrates both perspectives, recognizing that while suffering often results from spiritual failings, proper response through confession and prayer (as modeled in this psalm) can transform suffering into spiritual elevation.

[iii] The superscription 'For the choir director. A psalm of David' establishes this as one of the psalms intended for Temple worship. The term 'lamnatze'ach' (לַמְנַצֵּחַ) literally means 'for the one who overcomes' and became a technical term for the Temple choir director.

[iv] This opening phrase employs a Hebrew grammatical form called the 'infinitive absolute' followed by the finite verb of the same root (קוה), creating a sense of emphatic waiting or expectation. This construction intensifies the action, conveying 'I waited intensely' or 'I waited with complete patience.'

[v] These powerful metaphors describe a life-threatening situation: 'bor sha'on' (pit of destruction/tumult) suggests both physical danger and spiritual chaos, while 'tit hayaven' (miry clay) evokes being trapped in a substance from which one cannot escape without help. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these metaphors would be understood as referring to serious illness and its spiritual dimensions.

[A] Or: "they have become too mighty to recount" — The Hebrew 'atzmu' (עָצְמוּ) carries connotations of strength and might, not just numerical quantity. This alternative captures the overwhelming power of God's wonders, not merely their number.

[B] Or: "ears You have dug for me" — This more literal translation of the Hebrew verb 'karita' (כָּרִיתָ) captures the physical imagery of excavation or digging, which some commentators interpret as referring to God creating receptivity in the psalmist.

[1] This verse is crucial to understanding Ma'avar Yabok's approach to death and illness. While the book details many rituals and prayers, it consistently emphasizes that external observances are meaningless without interior spiritual preparation—receptive ears and an obedient heart.

[2] The psalmist's acknowledgment of overwhelming sin connects to Ma'avar Yabok's understanding of illness as potentially related to spiritual failings, requiring confession (vidui) as part of the healing process.

[i] This phrase literally means 'ears You have dug for me,' which has been interpreted in various ways. It may refer to the creation of the ears, to making the psalmist receptive to divine instruction, or (as in some ancient translations) to the preparation of a body. The emphasis is on God creating receptivity to divine will rather than desiring external sacrifices.

[ii] The phrase 'Your Torah is within my inner parts' uses the Hebrew 'me'ai' (מֵעַי), which literally refers to the intestines or internal organs. This visceral image depicts internalization of divine teaching at the deepest physical level, not merely intellectual acceptance.

[iii] The expression 'my heart has failed me' (literally 'my heart has abandoned me') poignantly describes both physical weakness and emotional despair, making this psalm particularly relevant for those with serious illness where both physical and emotional suffering occur simultaneously.

[iv] The Hebrew expression 'he'ach he'ach' (הֶאָח הֶאָח) is an exclamation of malicious delight at another's misfortune. This double repetition emphasizes the cruelty of those who mock the suffering person.

בְחָלְיוֹ [iv]׃ אֲנִי־אָמַרְתִּי יְיָ חָנֵּנִי

(Psalm 41) For the chief musician. A psalm of David. Happy is one who considers the poor;[A] in the day of trouble, the LORD will deliver him. The LORD will 885R preserve him and keep him alive; he shall be blessed in the land, and You will not deliver him to the will of his enemies. The LORD will sustain him on his sickbed;[2] You will transform his entire bed during his illness.[B] I said, "LORD, be gracious to me; heal my 890R

[A] Or: "Blessed is one who acts wisely toward the afflicted" — This alternative emphasizes the intellectual discernment (from the root s-k-l) needed when caring for the sick, and broadens "dal" to include all afflicted people, not just the economically poor. This interpretation would better align with Ma'avar Yabok's focus on proper care for the ill.

[B] Or: "You completely change his condition in his illness" — The Hebrew "mishkav" (bed) can also refer metaphorically to one's condition or situation. This interpretation suggests that God fundamentally transforms the sick person's entire state, which aligns with the kabbalistic view of illness as potentially transformative rather than merely punitive.

[1] The psalm concludes with humble acknowledgment of dependence on divine help, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on humility and surrender as the proper spiritual stance when facing illness or approaching death.

[2] This verse forms a cornerstone of Jewish teachings on visiting the sick (bikur cholim). The psalm creates a spiritual reciprocity: those who care for others in illness will themselves be cared for by God should they become ill.

[i] Cf. Psalm 70 — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok's 'Seder' section is significant as it combines themes of divine rescue from death-like circumstances with an urgent plea for immediate help. The psalm's dual nature—thanksgiving for past deliverance followed by urgent petition for present troubles—makes it particularly appropriate for the sick who might reflect on past healings while seeking present relief. | Cf. Hebrews 10:5-7 — While Ma'avar Yabok would not directly reference Christian interpretations, this psalm's emphasis on interior devotion over external sacrifice aligns with the work's focus on sincere spiritual preparation for death over mere ritual observance. | Cf. Zohar III:216b — Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework would interpret the 'pit' metaphor as representing both physical illness and spiritual descent, with the psalm offering hope that God can rescue even from these depths. | Cf. Midrash Tehillim 40:2 — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm would be understood as describing not just physical rescue but spiritual purification from sin, which aligns with the book's emphasis on confession and repentance during illness.

[ii] The Hebrew phrase "maskil el-dal" has layers of meaning beyond simply "considers the poor." It suggests giving thoughtful attention (from the root s-k-l, to understand or be wise) to the needy or afflicted. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would refer specifically to tending to the sick as a form of spiritual wisdom.

[iii] The phrase "eres devai" (bed of illness) is significant in Ma'avar Yabok as it directly relates to the book's focus on care for the bedridden sick. This verse was particularly important in Jewish traditions around visiting the sick (bikur cholim).

[iv] The Hebrew "You have transformed his entire bed in his illness" is ambiguous and has been interpreted in several ways in rabbinic tradition: 1) God transforms the sick person's suffering into comfort; 2) God assists in turning the patient's bedding for comfort; or 3) the illness completely transforms the person's experience of rest. This verse was central to Jewish teachings about divine involvement in healing.

soul, for I have sinned against You."[1] My enemies speak evil of me, saying, "When will he die and his name perish?" And if one comes to visit, he speaks falsely;[2] his heart gathers wickedness to itself, then he goes outside and speaks it. All who hate me whisper together against me; against me they devise harm for me. "A wicked thing is poured into him,[A] and now that he lies down, he will rise no more." Even my close friend in whom I trusted, who ate my bread, has lifted up his heel against me.[3] But You, O LORD, be gracious to me and raise me up, that I may repay them. By this I know that You delight in me: that my enemy does not triumph over me. As for me, You uphold me in my integrity and set me before Your presence forever. Blessed be the LORD, God of Israel,[4] from everlasting to everlasting. Amen and [A] Or: "An incurable disease clings to him" — Based on rabbinic interpretations that view "devar-beliyaal" as referring specifically to a fatal illness. This reading would be more specific to Ma'avar Yabok's context of serious illness, though it's more interpretive than literal.

[1] This reflects the Jewish understanding that illness often requires both physical and spiritual healing. The psalmist's focus on healing the soul first aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on spiritual preparation during illness.

[2] The psalm contrasts proper visitation of the sick with improper visitation characterized by false speech and harmful intentions. Ma'avar Yabok would have included this psalm partly to instruct readers on proper versus improper behavior when visiting the ill.

[3] This expression of betrayal by a close friend would have special resonance for the seriously ill who might experience abandonment by friends and family. The psalm validates these feelings while still expressing ultimate trust in divine support.

[4] This doxology (blessing formula) actually marks the end of Book I of Psalms (Psalms 1-41) rather than being part of the original psalm. Its inclusion in prayer sequences for the sick would have added a formal liturgical closing to the recitation.

[i] This verse reflects the traditional Jewish understanding that illness could be connected to sin, and that healing required both physical and spiritual remedies. The request to "heal my soul" emphasizes spiritual healing as primary, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework.

[ii] This describes insincere visitation of the sick, where someone comes with false pretenses. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this passage would underscore the importance of proper intention when visiting the sick, contrasting false visitors with those who truly care for the ill person's wellbeing.

[iii] The phrase "devar-beliyaal yatzuk bo" literally means "a thing of Belial is poured into him," where Belial represents wickedness or worthlessness. This was interpreted in rabbinic tradition as referring to a fatal illness or condition that has taken hold of the person, rendering recovery impossible in the eyes of enemies.

[iv] "Ish shelomi" (literally "man of my peace/welfare") refers to a close friend or confidant. The betrayal described here would have resonated with the sick who sometimes experienced abandonment by friends during serious illness, making this psalm particularly relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of proper care for the dying.

[v] Cf. Zohar — Ma'avar Yabok likely included Psalm 41 in its prayer sequences because of the Zohar's interpretation that this psalm specifically relates to the spiritual dimensions of illness and the merit of those who properly visit and care for the sick. | Cf. Talmud — Ma'avar Yabok would have incorporated this psalm into its prayer sequences based on this Talmudic interpretation that visiting the sick has actual healing power and that God responds to proper visitation by supporting the ill person. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The inclusion of this psalm in a prayer sequence reinforces the book's earlier teachings about bikur cholim (visiting the sick), creating an integrated approach where theoretical teachings are supported by specific prayers and psalms to be recited during such visits.

Amen.

(Torah) For the LORD your God is a merciful God;[1] He will not abandon you or destroy you, and He will not forget the covenant of your ancestors that He swore to them. And you who cling to the LORD your God are all alive today. And the LORD relented concerning the harm which He had spoken of doing to His people. You have been shown, in order to know, that the LORD is God; there is none besides Him.[2] Know therefore today, and take it to your heart, that the LORD is God in heaven above and on the earth below; there is none else. And you shall know that the LORD your God, He is God, the faithful God who keeps covenant and loving-kindness with those who love Him and keep His commandments, to a thousand generations.[3]

[1]This collection of verses is labeled '(Torah)' to indicate they come from the Pentateuch, following Ma'avar Yabok's pattern of organizing healing verses by their scriptural source (Torah, Prophets, and Writings).

[2]This phrase appears in Ma'avar Yabok's list of specific healing formulas and was considered particularly powerful when recited with proper intention. The repetition of this concept three times in this verse collection (with slight variations) would have been seen as spiritually significant.

[3]These verses appear in the fourth liturgical order (Seder Dalet) of Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer sequences for the sick. They establish God's mercy, covenant faithfulness, and absolute sovereignty—theological foundations that frame illness as ultimately subject to divine control and potentially reversible through proper prayer.

[i]The Hebrew verb דבק (to cleave/cling) has mystical significance in kabbalistic thought, describing the ideal state of attachment between the human soul and God. In the context of illness, this verse suggests that spiritual attachment to God is connected to physical vitality.

[ii]The concept of God "relenting" from harm is particularly significant in a healing context, as it provides biblical precedent for the possibility that divine decrees of illness might be reversed through proper prayer.

[iii]This phrase "there is none besides Him" appears elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok as a specific healing formula to be recited for "strange illnesses." Its inclusion in this collection of verses emphasizes its perceived therapeutic power.

[iv]Cf. Deuteronomy 4:31 — This verse emphasizes God's mercy and covenant faithfulness, which would be especially relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of illness and suffering. It offers reassurance that God will not abandon the sufferer, even in their distress. | Cf. Deuteronomy 4:4 — This verse connects physical life with spiritual attachment to God. In Ma'avar Yabok, this would suggest that clinging to God spiritually is a path to life, even when physically threatened by illness. | Cf. Exodus 32:14 — This verse about God relenting from punishment offers hope that divine decrees of illness might also be reversed through proper prayer and repentance, a central theme in Ma'avar Yabok. | Cf. Deuteronomy 4:35, 4:39-40 — These verses emphasize absolute divine unity and sovereignty, which in Ma'avar Yabok's context would reinforce that illness and healing are ultimately in God's hands alone. The phrase 'there is none besides Him' (אין עוד מלבדו) is specifically mentioned in Ma'avar Yabok as a powerful healing formula.

[v]This indicates that the following verses come from the Prophets section of the Hebrew Bible (Nevi'im), the second major division of the Tanakh. In Ma'avar Yabok, biblical verses are often organized by their source (Torah, Prophets, Writings) to create structured healing prayers.

neither be confounded, for you will not be disgraced.

[A] Or: "And those ransomed by the LORD shall return and enter Zion with joyful shouting" — This alternate translation emphasizes the act of divine ransoming (פדה carries connotations of paying a redemption price) and captures the exuberant nature of רִנָּה, which is more than just singing but jubilant, triumphant exclamation. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this might better convey the soul's victorious journey after being ransomed from suffering.

[1] This powerful messianic prophecy is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok, which focuses on the transition between life and death. The Hebrew verb בִּלַּע (bila) carries connotations of complete consumption or elimination, suggesting not just the end of death but its total absorption into divine power.

[2] The Hebrew term חוֹכֵי (chochei) for 'those who wait' carries connotations of hopeful anticipation rather than passive waiting. In the context of illness, this blessing on those who wait suggests that patient endurance of suffering while maintaining hope for divine intervention is itself a spiritually meritorious state.

[3] The Hebrew phrase וְנָסוּ יָגוֹן וַאֲנָחָה uses the verb נָסוּ (nasu, 'they shall flee') to personify sorrow and sighing as enemies that will be driven away. This vivid imagery of negative emotions actively fleeing creates a powerful contrast with the enduring joy that replaces them.

[4] This cosmic language about establishing heavens and founding earth connects human speech and divine protection to the very creation of the universe. In Ma'avar Yabok, this suggests that proper prayers for healing participate in the ongoing divine work of sustaining creation.

[i] This powerful phrase about God swallowing up death forever comes from Isaiah 25:8 and represents one of the most explicit statements in the Hebrew Bible about the ultimate elimination of death. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse transforms the immediate experience of mortality into a temporary state within a larger divine plan.

[ii] This phrase about 'the redeemed of the LORD' returning begins Isaiah 35:10, which describes the joyful return of exiles to Zion. In Ma'avar Yabok, this national redemption imagery is repurposed to describe the soul's journey after death as a form of spiritual homecoming.

[iii] This poignant verse from Isaiah 54:7 uses the metaphor of God as husband and Israel as wife, describing a brief abandonment followed by compassionate reconciliation. In the context of illness, it reframes suffering as a temporary divine withdrawal that will be followed by even greater compassion.

[A] Or: "For a mere instant I abandoned you, but with abundant mercies I will collect you" — This alternative emphasizes the extreme brevity of רֶגַע קָטֹן (literally 'small moment') and the plurality of רַחֲמִים (mercies/compassions), which derives from the Hebrew word for 'womb' and suggests motherly tenderness. The verb אֲקַבְּצֵךְ (I will collect/gather) can have connotations of bringing scattered parts back together, which might be relevant in the context of illness where one feels 'scattered' or fragmented.

[B] Or: "Then your light shall burst forth like the morning, and your recovery shall speedily flourish" — This alternate translation captures the forceful nature of יִבָּקַע (to burst, break open with force) and the organic, growth-oriented imagery of תִצְמָח (to sprout, flourish, grow). The term אַרֻכָתֵךְ specifically refers to physical recovery or healing of wounds, which is important in the context of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok.

[1] The metaphor of widowhood (אַלְמְנוּתַיִךְ) draws on the common biblical portrayal of Israel as God's bride, with periods of divine absence described as widowhood. In the context of illness and approaching death, this suggests that the current experience of spiritual abandonment will be replaced by a renewed divine relationship where previous suffering is forgotten.

[i] This verse from Isaiah 58:8 explicitly connects light with healing (אַרֻכָתֵךְ, literally 'your healing'). The imagery of healing 'sprouting quickly' uses botanical metaphors to suggest that recovery can manifest suddenly, like plants breaking through soil at dawn.

[ii] This verse from Isaiah 55:13 uses botanical transformation (thorns becoming cypress trees, briers becoming myrtles) as a metaphor for redemptive change. In Ma'avar Yabok, this imagery suggests that the suffering of illness will ultimately be replaced by spiritual beauty and fragrance.

[iii] This phrase from Isaiah 57:19 literally means 'creating the fruit/utterance of lips,' referring to divinely inspired speech. The repetition of 'peace, peace' (שָׁלוֹם שָׁלוֹם) intensifies the concept, while 'far and near' suggests universal application. In the context of healing prayers, it suggests that properly directed speech itself has creative power.

[iv] Cf. Isaiah 25:9 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse serves as a powerful statement of faith and hope, transforming the experience of illness or approaching death into an anticipated divine encounter where suffering will end and salvation will arrive. | Cf. Isaiah 25:8 — This reference provides profound comfort for the dying and their attendants by reframing death as a temporary state that will eventually be overcome by divine power. The verse transforms the immediate experience of mortality into a transitional phase within a larger divine plan. | Cf. Isaiah 30:18 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse reframes divine patience as an expression of compassion rather than abandonment, encouraging the sick to await divine mercy with trust rather than despair. | Cf. Isaiah 35:10 — This verse is repurposed in Ma'avar Yabok to depict the soul's journey after death as a form of redemption and homecoming, comparing death to exile and the afterlife to a joyful return to one's spiritual source. | Cf. Isaiah 51:16 — In the context of illness and approaching death, this verse reassures the sick person that they remain under divine protection ('shadow of My hand') and retain cosmic significance even in their weakened state. | Cf. Isaiah 54:4-8 — In Ma'avar Yabok, these verses reframe illness as a temporary divine withdrawal that will be followed by compassionate restoration, using the metaphor of marital reconciliation to describe the divine-human relationship even through suffering. | Cf. Isaiah 58:8-9 — In the context of Ma'avar dren of men take refuge in the shadow of Your wings.

[A] Or: "For in Him our heart shall rejoice, for in His holy name we have placed our trust" — This alternative uses future tense for 'rejoice' and expands 'trusted' to 'placed our trust,' which might better express the ongoing nature of the faithful relationship being described. This could be preferable in contexts emphasizing the continuing nature of divine care.

[B] Or: "The LORD is the redeemer of His servants' souls, and all who seek shelter in Him will not be held guilty" — This alternative emphasizes God's identity as redeemer and uses the more concrete 'seek shelter' for the Hebrew 'חסים'. It also renders 'יֶאְשְׁמוּ' as 'held guilty' rather than 'condemned,' which might better capture the legal connotation of the Hebrew term.

[C] Or: "For with You is the source of life; by Your light we perceive light" — This translation uses 'source' for מְקוֹר instead of 'fountain' and 'perceive' for נִרְאֶה instead of 'see,' which might better capture the spiritual and intellectual dimensions of divine illumination being described. In kabbalistic contexts like Ma'avar Yabok, this verse often refers to spiritual perception beyond physical sight.

[1] The Hebrew text concludes with God's direct promise of healing (וּרְפָאתִיו), functioning as both the climax and summary of this collection of prophetic verses. This divine first-person commitment to heal serves as a powerful conclusion to this section of healing prayers in Ma'avar Yabok.

[2] I've translated the Hebrew נַפְשֵׁנוּ (nafshenu) as "our soul" in the singular following the Hebrew original, though in English "our souls" might sound more natural. This singular form emphasizes the collective nature of the prayer, with the community speaking as one entity.

[3] This striking physical imagery represents the totality of one's being praising God. In the context of healing prayers, this suggests that even the physical body (represented by bones) participates in acknowledging divine salvation.

Yabok, these verses connect physical healing with moral and spiritual renewal, suggesting that true healing addresses both body and soul through ethical living and divine connection. | Cf. Isaiah 55:13 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse functions as a metaphor for the transformation of suffering into blessing, suggesting that illness and approaching death will ultimately yield to a more beautiful and enduring spiritual state. | Cf. Isaiah 57:19 — This final verse emphasizes divine healing as both physical and spiritual, bringing peace to both those distant from and close to God. In Ma'avar Yabok, it suggests that prayer itself ('fruit of the lips') can create healing and peace. | Cf. Zohar — Ma'avar Yabok's inclusion of these particular prophetic verses reflects the kabbalistic approach of the Zohar, which reinterprets national redemption narratives as templates for individual spiritual journeys, particularly at the end of life.

Delight yourself in the LORD, and He will give you the desires of your heart. Commit your way to the LORD; trust also in Him, and He will do it.[A] He will bring forth your righteousness as the light, and your justice as the noonday. Wait for the LORD and keep His way, and He will exalt you to inherit the land; when the wicked are cut off, you will see it. Let not the foot of pride come upon me, nor the hand of the wicked drive me away. But the salvation of the righteous is from the LORD; He is their stronghold in time of trouble. The LORD helps them and delivers them; He delivers them from the wicked and saves them, because they take refuge in Him. And now, Lord, what do I wait for? My hope is in You.[1] Hear my prayer, O LORD, and give ear to my cry; do not be silent at my tears; for I am a stronger with You, a sojourner, as all my fathers were. The LORD of hosts is with us;[2] the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.

יאמר למען יחלצון ידידיך[ii] וגומר

He shall recite: "That Your beloved ones may be

[A] Or: "Roll your path onto the LORD; trust in Him, and He will act" — This alternative preserves the physical metaphor in the Hebrew 'גּוֹל' (roll) and uses 'act' for 'יַעֲשֶׂה' rather than 'do it,' which might better capture the sense of divine intervention. The physical imagery of 'rolling' one's burden onto God would be especially meaningful in a healing context.

[1] The Hebrew תּוֹחַלְתִּי literally means "my expectation" or "what I wait for," conveying both hope and patient anticipation. In the context of illness, this represents placing all one's expectation for healing or peaceful transition in God's hands.

[2] The divine title יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת (LORD of hosts) evokes God's command over angelic armies, emphasizing divine power and protection. This concluding verse offers powerful reassurance that divine protection surrounds those who are ill or dying.

[i] Cf. Psalm 33:20-22 — These verses express collective trust in God as protector, which in Ma'avar Yabok's context would reassure the sick person that they remain under divine care despite their suffering. | Cf. Psalm 35:10 — The image of 'all my bones' praising God would resonate deeply in a healing context, suggesting that even the physical body participates in acknowledging divine deliverance. | Cf. Psalm 36:8-10 — The images of taking refuge 'under God's wings' and experiencing 'the fountain of life' would provide profound comfort to the ill, promising divine nurture and protection even at the threshold of death. | Cf. Psalm 37:3-7 — These verses encourage the sick to maintain their trust in God and commit their path to Him, promising that their righteousness will ultimately be recognized 'as the noonday' despite current suffering. | Cf. Psalm 39:13 — The description of human life as a temporary sojourn aligns perfectly with Ma'avar Yabok's focus on death as a transition, reminding readers that all humans are merely passing through this world. | Cf. Psalm 46:8 — This concluding verse offers powerful reassurance of divine presence and protection, making it an ideal closing for a healing prayer sequence in Ma'avar Yabok. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Seder Dalet — This passage appears to be the Writings (Ketuvim) section of verses in the fourth prayer sequence, following psalms and preceding the standard concluding healing formulas. | Cf. Zohar — The references to divine light ('in Your light we see light') connect to kabbalistic teachings about divine illumination as a source of healing and spiritual transformation, themes central to Ma'avar Yabok's approach.

[ii] This is the beginning of a verse from Psalm 60:7/108:7, which continues "הושיעה ימינך וענני" ("save with Your right hand and answer me"). The "וגומר" (etc.) indicates that the prayer leader should continue with the rest of this verse.

[A] Or: "One should recite: "That Your beloved ones may be delivered..." "Heal me, O LORD..." following the entire sequence written above through "my Rock and my Redeemer."" — This alternate translation uses "one should" instead of "he shall" for a more gender-neutral instruction, and replaces "etc." with ellipses to indicate continuation. It might be preferable in contexts seeking more inclusive language while maintaining the liturgical instructions' meaning.

[1] This simple heading marks the beginning of the fifth liturgical sequence in Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer system. Though brief, it serves as an important navigational marker in the text, helping those caring for the sick or dying to find the appropriate prayers and readings for their situation. These carefully organized prayer sequences were designed to provide spiritual comfort and healing for both the ill person and those attending them.

[2] This is a navigational instruction in the prayer manual, directing the reader to recite the opening formula that was provided in full earlier in the text. The phrase 'Ana Hashem hoshiah na' (Please, O LORD, save us) comes from Psalm 118:25 and was a common opening for liturgical prayers.

[3] These four psalms share themes relevant to illness and spiritual distress. Psalm 42-43 (sometimes

[i] This begins a verse from Jeremiah 17:14, which continues "וארפא הושיעני ואושעה כי תהלתי אתה" ("and I will be healed; save me, and I will be saved, for You are my praise"). This prayer appears earlier in the text as part of a standard formula to be recited three times.

[ii] The final phrase "צורי וגואלי" (my Rock and my Redeemer) comes from Psalm 19:15 and marks the conclusion of this prayer sequence. The apostrophe after this word in the Hebrew indicates an abbreviation.

[iii] Cf. Psalm 60:7 — This verse is used as an opening formula in the standardized prayer sequence, invoking divine deliverance for those whom God loves. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this takes on added significance as a plea for the sick person's deliverance from illness or a peaceful transition at death. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This verse has been adapted as a healing formula in Ma'avar Yabok, to be recited three times as part of the standard closing for each liturgical sequence. Its use reflects the text's emphasis on divine healing and salvation, presenting God as the ultimate source of both physical and spiritual restoration. | Cf. Psalm 19:15 — This phrase serves as a standard conclusion to the prayer sequences in Ma'avar Yabok, creating a formal closing that invokes God as both stable foundation ('Rock') and active savior ('Redeemer'). Its use connects these healing prayers to the broader Jewish liturgical tradition where this verse is frequently used to conclude prayers.

[iv] This heading identifies the fifth of eight liturgical sequences (sedarim) in Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer system for healing the sick and comforting the dying. Each 'seder' follows a similar pattern with specific prayers and readings.

[v] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's Seder section — The eight prayer sequences follow a consistent structure with opening prayers, psalms, biblical verses organized by source, and concluding prayers. Each begins with the same opening formula but offers different psalm options appropriate to various situations related to illness and approaching death. | Cf. The title 'Ma'avar Yabok' — These prayer sequences are designed to assist in this spiritual crossing by providing structured liturgical support for those who are ill or approaching death.

[vi] This instruction indicates that the prayer leader should begin with the opening formula that starts with 'Ana Hashem hoshiah na' (Please, O LORD, save us). The abbreviation 'וגו' (etc.) indicates that the complete formula, which was presented earlier in the text, should be recited without being repeated in full here.

[vii] This refers to the First Order (Seder Alef) presented earlier in Ma'avar Yabok, where the complete opening prayer formula was written out in full. This cross-reference helps users navigate between different sections of the prayer manual.

considered a single composition) expresses deep longing for God during distress; Psalm 51 is a profound prayer of repentance; and Psalm 61 is a plea for divine protection in times of overwhelming circumstances. The choice among these options allows the prayer leader to select the psalm most appropriate to the sick person’s specific condition.

[1] This refers to a prayer beginning with ‘Barukh tihyeh’ (Blessed shall you be) that appears later in the text. This prayer, which begins with Deuteronomy 7:14, contains promises of divine blessing, protection from illness, and healing.

[2] This powerful opening image establishes the psalm’s central metaphor of spiritual thirst. In the context of Ma’avar Yabok, this would resonate deeply with the sick or dying person who feels distant from normal religious life and community.

[3] In the original context, this likely referred to pilgrimage to the Temple. In Ma’avar Yabok, this question takes on additional significance for the ill person contemplating their mortality and future divine encounter, either through recovery and return to synagogue worship or through death and spiritual transition.

[4] This powerful metaphor of consuming one’s own grief would be particularly relevant to the sick person who might be unable to eat properly and instead subsists on their suffering.

[i] The Hebrew abbreviations מ״ב, מ״ג, נ״א, and ס״א refer to Psalms 42, 43, 51, and 61 respectively. These psalms were carefully selected for their thematic relevance to illness and approaching death. The prayer leader is given a choice among these options, allowing flexibility to select the most appropriate psalm for the specific situation.

[ii] The phrase ‘ברוך תהיה וגו” (Blessed shall you be, etc.) refers to a prayer beginning with those words that appears later in the text. The abbreviation ‘וגו” indicates that the full prayer should be recited although it is not repeated here in the instructions.

[iii] Cf. Deuteronomy 7:14-15 — This biblical passage, which begins the prayer mentioned in the instruction, would have provided both comfort and theological framing for illness as potentially related to divine judgment but also promising divine healing and blessing to the faithful. | Cf. Psalm 51 — This psalm’s inclusion as an option for the sick reflects Ma’avar Yabok’s theological framework that illness could be connected to sin, and proper repentance might contribute to healing. Its themes of purification (‘Cleanse me with hyssop’) would be especially resonant in the context of illness.

[iv] This superscription indicates the psalm was composed for or by the sons of Korah, a Levitical family of Temple musicians. “Maskil” likely indicates a didactic or contemplative psalm requiring special attention.

[v] The Hebrew uses feminine “תַּעֲרֹג” (longs) with the masculine noun “אַיָּל” (deer), possibly implying a female deer or hind, creating a poignant image of desperate thirst and longing.

[vi] The phrase “בַּסָּךְ” is difficult to translate precisely. It may refer to a thicket, a throng, or a procession, but in context likely refers to leading the festive procession to the Temple.

As with a shattering of my bones, my adversaries taunt me, saying to me all day long, "Where is your God?" Why are you downcast, O my soul, and why are you disquieted within me? Hope in God, for I shall yet praise Him, the salvation of my countenance and my God.

(Psalm 43) Judge me, O God, and plead my case against an ungodly nation; deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man. For You are the God of my strength; why have You cast me off? Why do I go mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?

literal translation of the Hebrew verbs preserves the physical imagery of bowing down (שָׁחָה) and moaning/groaning (הָמָה), which connects to bodily experience of the sick person in Ma'avar Yabok's context.

[A] Or: "from the land of the Jordan and the Hermons, from the humble mountain" — The word מִצְעָר can be understood as a proper name (Mount Mizar) or as 'small/humble mountain.' This alternate reading creates a meaningful contrast between the majestic Hermons and the small mountain, potentially symbolizing the human soul's humility before God.

[1] The imagery of overwhelming divine waters represents both the psalmist's sufferings and God's overwhelming presence. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this captures the experience of serious illness as both a spiritual trial and an encounter with divine power.

[i] This powerful poetic image of "deep calling to deep" depicts overwhelming waves of suffering, using the same word "תְּהוֹם" (deep) that appears in Genesis 1:2 to describe primordial waters, suggesting chaos returning.

[ii] The phrase literally means "with murder/crushing in my bones" and communicates how the taunts of enemies physically affect the psalmist, creating bone-deep pain.

[iii] Cf. Psalms 42-43 — This psalm would have been recognized as part of a longer prayer expressing spiritual thirst during times of separation from the Temple worship. In Ma'avar Yabok, it functions as a profound expression of the soul's yearning for divine connection, especially relevant for the sick who feel distant from God. | Cf. Zohar — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences would evoke kabbalistic interpretations where the soul's longing for God represents the mystical desire for union with the Divine Presence, particularly relevant during illness when one feels spiritually distant. | Cf. Talmud Berakhot 3a — The imagery of 'deep calls to deep' and divine waves passing over the psalmist connects to the rabbinic concept of God's own mourning for separation from Israel, creating a parallel between human and divine suffering that would resonate with the sick person's experience of separation from normal religious life.

[iv] The term 'ungodly nation' (literally 'a nation without loving-kindness') is often interpreted in Jewish tradition as referring to internal spiritual enemies as well as external ones. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this could represent the negative spiritual forces believed to attack the sick or dying person.

For the choir director. A psalm of David, when Nathan the prophet came to him after he had gone in to Bathsheba. Have mercy on me, O God, according to Your lovingkindness; according to the abundance of Your compassion, blot out my transgressions. Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity and cleanse me from my sin. For I know my transgressions, and my sin is always before me. Against You, You alone, have I sinned and done what is evil in

[1]The Hebrew phrase 'שִׂמְחַת גִּילִי' combines two terms for joy, creating an emphatic expression that suggests profound, ecstatic joy. I've chosen to translate this as 'the joy of my delight' to capture this intensification.

[2]The phrase 'יְשׁוּעֹת פָּנַי' (literally 'salvations of my face') is difficult to render in English. It suggests that divine deliverance is reflected in the psalmist's face or appearance, transforming sorrow into visible joy. This connects to the Jewish concept that physical illness and spiritual distress are interconnected, with healing manifesting both spiritually and physically.

[i]The 'altar of God' represents the ultimate destination in this psalm's spiritual journey. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would be understood as the soul's arrival at divine presence after traversing the difficulties of illness or the transition of death.

[ii]This refrain, which also appears in Psalm 42, has the speaker addressing his own soul, creating a form of spiritual self-dialogue. This technique was highly valued in Jewish spiritual practice, especially for the ill and dying who were encouraged to engage in this kind of internal conversation to maintain hope.

[iii]Cf. Psalm 42 — Psalm 43 was likely originally part of the same composition as Psalm 42, as evidenced by the identical refrain. In Ma'avar Yabok, these psalms were chosen for the sick and dying because they express both spiritual distress and hope for divine deliverance, mirroring the experience of someone facing serious illness. | Cf. Zohar — The phrase 'Send forth Your light and Your truth' resonates with kabbalistic concepts found throughout Ma'avar Yabok, where divine light (אור) represents spiritual illumination and healing power. This would be understood as a request for divine emanations to guide the soul through darkness, whether of illness or approaching death. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The psalm's journey motif—from oppression to divine altar—mirrors the book's central metaphor of 'crossing the Yabok,' representing the soul's transition from distress to divine presence. The phrase 'holy mountain' also resonates with the book's use of ascent imagery for spiritual elevation.

[iv]This superscription places the psalm in the historical context of King David's repentance after committing adultery with Bathsheba and arranging the death of her husband Uriah (2 Samuel 11-12). The psalm thus became the paradigmatic model for confession and repentance in Jewish tradition.

[v]The text shows an editorial correction in the Hebrew. The original text read 'harbeh' (increase), while the corrected reading in brackets is 'herev' (multiply/thoroughly), a more grammatically appropriate form in this context.

[vi]This phrase has been interpreted in various ways, since David clearly sinned against Uriah and Bathsheba as well. Jewish commentators often explain this as acknowledging that all sin ultimately violates divine law, or that only God can forgive the spiritual dimension of sin, even when humans are also wronged.

Your sight, so that You may be justified when You speak and blameless when You judge. Behold, I was brought forth in iniquity, and in sin my mother conceived me. Behold, You desire truth in the inward parts, and in the hidden part You will make me know wisdom. Purify me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.[1] Let me hear joy and gladness, that the bones You have crushed may rejoice.[2] Hide Your face from my sins and blot out all my iniquities. Create in me a clean heart,[3] O God, and renew a steadfast spirit within me. Do not cast me away from Your presence,[4] and do not take Your Holy Spirit from me. Restore to me the joy of Your salvation, and uphold me with a willing spirit. Then I will teach transgressors Your ways,[5] and sinners will return to You. Deliver me from bloodguilt, O God, God of my salvation, and my tongue will sing aloud of Your righteousness. O Lord, open my lips, and my mouth will declare Your praise. For You do not delight in sacrifice, or I would give it; You do not take pleasure in burnt offerings. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and contrite heart, O God, You will not despise. Do good to Zion in Your good pleasure;[6] build the walls

[1]The imagery of being cleansed 'whiter than snow' is a powerful metaphor for complete spiritual purification. In Jewish mystical tradition, this whitening represents the transformation of spiritual qualities, similar to how Ma'avar Yabok describes the evil inclination being 'whitened like snow' in the afterlife.

[2]This vivid physical imagery of crushed bones parallels Ma'avar Yabok's understanding of physical suffering as potentially beneficial to the soul, breaking down negative spiritual forces while strengthening the soul's dominance.

[3]The Hebrew verb 'bera' (create) is the same used in Genesis 1:1, suggesting that spiritual renewal requires divine creative power comparable to the creation of the world. This reinforces Ma'avar Yabok's theme that genuine spiritual transformation requires divine intervention.

[4]This plea reflects the fear of spiritual abandonment, which in Ma'avar Yabok's framework would be understood as particularly relevant for the dying, who seek assurance that their souls will be received by God rather than rejected.

[5]This verse establishes the principle that one who has experienced forgiveness is obligated to guide others toward repentance, similar to how Ma'avar Yabok emphasizes that properly guiding others to repentance creates merit that strengthens divine forces.

[6]The psalm's conclusion shifts from individual to communal concerns, suggesting that personal repentance contributes to collective redemption. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's integration of individual spiritual preparation with broader cosmic repair.

[i]This references the purification ritual described in Leviticus 14:4-7, where hyssop was dipped in the blood of a sacrificed bird and used to sprinkle a person being cleansed from ritual impurity. The metaphor connects physical purification rituals with spiritual cleansing.

[ii]The Hebrew 'damim' (literally 'bloods') refers to bloodguilt or blood-shed, likely referring to David's responsibility for Uriah's death. This is one of the most explicit references to the specific sin that prompted the psalm.

[iii]This key verse establishes the spiritual principle that internal contrition is more valuable than external ritual, a theme that runs throughout prophetic literature. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this principle is particularly relevant to confession on the deathbed.

(Psalm 61) For the chief musician, on a stringed instrument.[1] Of David. Hear my cry, O God; attend to my prayer. From the end of the earth I call to You when my heart is faint;[2] lead me to the rock that is higher than I. For You have been a shelter for me, a strong tower against the enemy. I will dwell in Your tent forever;[A] I will take refuge in the shelter of Your wings.[3] Selah. For You, O God, have heard my vows; You have given me the heritage of those who

[A] Or: "I will sojourn in Your tent for all eternity" — The verb אָגוּרָה carries a connotation of 'sojourning' or 'dwelling as a guest,' which better captures the temporary nature of earthly life compared to eternal dwelling. This nuance is significant in Ma'avar Yabok's context where the transition from temporary earthly dwelling to eternal spiritual existence is a central theme.

[1] This psalm appears in Ma'avar Yabok's fifth prayer sequence specifically selected for the sick. Its themes of divine protection during weakness and finding refuge in God make it particularly appropriate for those experiencing serious illness.

[2] The Hebrew בַּעֲטֹף לִבִּי literally means "when my heart is covered/wrapped/faint" and conveys a sense of overwhelming weakness or despair. For the ill person reciting this psalm, this phrase would acknowledge their physical and spiritual exhaustion while still maintaining hope in divine assistance.

[3] This metaphor of divine protection under God's wings appears throughout Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences. In kabbalistic interpretation, it represents the soul finding protection under the wings of the Shekhinah (Divine Presence), a concept particularly relevant for the vulnerable soul during illness or approaching death.

[i] Cf. 2 Samuel 12:1-14 — The psalm's heading explicitly connects it to David's repentance after his grave sins involving Bathsheba. This connection would remind readers of the severity of sin that can be forgiven through proper confession. | Cf. Zohar — Ma'avar Yabok frequently draws on Zoharic interpretations of confession (vidui) as having profound metaphysical effects. This psalm, as the quintessential confession prayer, would be understood in the context of the book as creating actual spiritual transformations. | Cf. Leviticus 14:4-7 — The psalm's reference to hyssop would remind readers of the ritual purification procedures for those with tzara'at (often translated as leprosy), connecting spiritual impurity with physical impurity, and suggesting that sin requires similar purification rituals. | Cf. Talmud Berakhot 34b — This psalm, as the paradigmatic penitential prayer, connects to Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on the spiritual power of genuine repentance that can transform one's spiritual fate, even on the deathbed.

[ii] This superscription indicates the psalm was intended to be performed with stringed instrumental accompaniment. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm appears in the fifth liturgical order (Seder Hei) as one of several psalms specifically recommended for recitation by or for the sick.

[iii] The phrase "when my heart is faint" (בַּעֲטֹף לִבִּי) resonates strongly in the context of illness, as it expresses the weakness and distress experienced by the sick person. The psalmist's sense of being at "the end of the earth" similarly captures the feeling of isolation that often accompanies serious illness.

[iv] The "rock that is higher than I" represents divine strength and stability when human strength fails, a particularly relevant metaphor for the sick person seeking divine support beyond their own diminished capabilities.

[v] The image of taking refuge "in the shelter of Your wings" (בְּסֵתֶר כְּנָפֶיךָ) appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok as a metaphor for divine protection, particularly for the soul of the sick or dying person. In kabbalistic terms, this represents being brought under the protection of the Divine Presence (Shekhinah).

fear Your name.[1] You will add days to the king's days; his years will be like many generations.[2] He shall abide before God forever;[A] appoint mercy and truth to preserve him.[B] So I will sing praise to Your name forever, that I may fulfill my vows day by day.[3] 1095R

(תורה) בָּרוּךְ תִּהְיֶה מִכָּל (Torah) You shall be blessed above all peoples;[C] there

[A] Or: "May he sit enthroned before God eternally" — The verb יֵשֵׁב can have royal connotations of 'sitting enthroned,' which could emphasize the dignified status of the righteous soul in God's presence after death—a theme consistent with Ma'avar Yabok's portrayal of the afterlife for those who have properly prepared themselves spiritually.

[B] Or: "they shall guard him" — The unusual form מַן could be interpreted as a plural subject ('they') rather than as an imperative ('appoint'). This would make mercy and truth the subject of the verb, emphasizing how divine attributes actively protect the righteous, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's portrayal of divine attributes as active forces in spiritual realms.

[C] Or: "You shall be blessed more than all peoples" — The Hebrew 'מִכָּל' could be translated as either 'above' or 'more than,' both conveying the comparative blessing promised to Israel. This alternative maintains the comparative aspect while using slightly different phrasing.

[1] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this heritage would be understood as both the spiritual rewards awaiting the righteous in the afterlife and the merit of belonging to a lineage of faithful practitioners of Judaism whose traditions provide comfort and guidance during life transitions.

[2] While this verse literally requests long life for the king, in Ma'avar Yabok's context it functions as both a prayer for healing (extended life) and a recognition of the eternal life awaiting the soul after death. This dual meaning makes it particularly appropriate in prayers that acknowledge both possible outcomes of serious illness.

[3] In Jewish tradition, making vows during illness (particularly pledges of charity or increased religious observance in exchange for healing) was common practice. This verse reflects both the ill person's hope for recovery and their commitment to spiritual practices whether in this world or the next.

[i] The "heritage of those who fear Your name" refers to the spiritual inheritance granted to the righteous. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would be understood as the divine reward awaiting those who properly prepare for death through repentance and spiritual practices.

[ii] While literally referring to the king's longevity, in the context of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, this verse serves a dual purpose: as a petition for extended life for the ill person and as a reminder of eternal life awaiting the righteous in the World to Come.

[iii] The Hebrew "man" (מַן) is an unusual form meaning "appoint" or "prepare." The pairing of "mercy and truth" (חֶסֶד וֶאֱמֶת) represents divine attributes that protect and preserve the righteous, a theme that would resonate strongly in prayers for divine protection during illness.

[iv] The fulfillment of vows "day by day" connects to Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper spiritual preparation throughout life. In the context of serious illness, this reflects the Jewish practice of making vows for charitable acts or increased religious observance in exchange for healing.

[v] Cf. Psalm 57:1 — The recurring motif of finding refuge under divine wings creates a consistent spiritual framework for those facing illness or death, emphasizing that God's protective presence extends even to the most vulnerable moments of human existence. | Cf. Psalm 91 — The thematic parallels between Psalms 61 and 91 around divine protection suggest why both were included in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequences. For the ill person, these texts create a consistent message that God's presence provides shelter during their most vulnerable moments. | Cf. Genesis 28:20 — In Ma'avar Yabok, the psalm's reference to fulfilling vows would remind readers of the biblical precedent of making vows during life transitions, reinforcing the practice of making pledges (often charitable) during illness with the hope of divine protection. | Cf. Zohar III:56a — For readers of Ma'avar Yabok familiar with Kabbalistic literature, the psalm's reference to taking refuge under divine wings would activate associations with the Zohar's teachings about the soul's protection under the Shekhinah's wings, especially during the vulnerable transition from life to death.

shall not be a barren male or barren female among you or among your cattle. And the LORD will remove from you all sickness and all the terrible diseases of Egypt[A] that you knew; He will not place them upon you, but will put them on all who hate you. And you shall know in your heart that just as a man disciplines his son, so the LORD your God disciplines you.[1] Therefore you shall keep His statutes and His commandments which I command you today, that it may go well with you and with your children after you, and that you may prolong your days on the land which the LORD your God gives you for all time.[2] You shall sanctify yourselves and be holy, for I am the LORD your God. No longer shall your name be called Jacob, but Israel,[3] for you have striven with God and with men, and have prevailed.[B]

[A] Or: "the evil afflictions of Egypt" — The Hebrew 'מַדְוֵי' refers to ailments or afflictions, while 'הָרָעִים' can be translated as 'evil' or 'terrible.' This alternative provides a more literal rendering of the terms while preserving the meaning.

[B] Or: "for you have contended with divine and human beings, and have overcome" — The

[1] This verse provides a theological framework for understanding suffering as potentially redemptive rather than merely punitive. In Ma'avar Yabok, this perspective helps the sick person interpret their illness within a meaningful spiritual narrative.

[2] The Hebrew phrase 'כָּל הַיָּמִים' literally means 'all the days' and emphasizes the permanence of God's gift, reinforcing the theme of life extension that would be particularly meaningful in prayers for the sick.

[3] The inclusion of the verse about Jacob becoming Israel is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok, whose title references Jacob's crossing of the Jabbok River where this transformation occurred. The struggle with illness is implicitly compared to Jacob's wrestling, suggesting that spiritual transformation may emerge from physical struggle.

[i] This refers specifically to barrenness in males and females, respectively. In the ancient Near Eastern context, fertility was considered one of the most fundamental divine blessings, making this promise particularly significant.

[ii] This refers to the plagues and diseases that afflicted Egypt, which became proverbial in biblical literature as examples of divine punishment. The promise of protection from these conditions would be especially meaningful to someone suffering from serious illness.

[iii] This establishes a parental metaphor for divine discipline that recurs throughout the Hebrew Bible. The comparison suggests that suffering, while painful, may be understood as corrective rather than punitive.

[iv] The promise of 'prolonging days' would be particularly relevant in a context of prayer for healing, as it directly addresses the central concern of extending life.

[v] This verse about Jacob's renaming to Israel after wrestling at the Jabbok River is especially significant given the book's title 'Ma'avar Yabok' (Crossing of the Jabbok). It suggests that struggle with illness, like Jacob's struggle, can lead to spiritual transformation.

[vi] Cf. Deuteronomy 7:14-15 — These verses from Deuteronomy are being included in this healing prayer sequence to remind the ill person of God's promises of health and blessing to the covenant community. The text establishes biblical precedent for praying for healing by recalling God's promises to remove illness. | Cf. Deuteronomy 8:5 — This verse serves as a theological foundation for understanding illness within Ma'avar Yabok's framework—as divine discipline motivated by love rather than mere punishment. It encourages the sick person to view suffering as potentially redemptive and character-forming. | Cf. Deuteronomy 4:40 — The echoes of Deuteronomy 4:40 suggest that recovery from illness is connected to renewed commitment to observing divine com-

(From Prophets) And the LORD was pleased to crush him, making him ill; if you make his soul a guilt offering,[A1] he shall see offspring, prolong his days, and the will of the LORD shall prosper in his hand. He grew up before Him like a tender shoot, like a root from dry ground. He had no form or majesty that we should look at him,[2] no appearance that we should desire him. He was pierced for our transgressions,[B] crushed for our iniquities; the chastisement for our peace was upon him,[C] and by his wounds we are healed.[3] He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he did not open his mouth; like a lamb led to slaughter,[4] and like a sheep silent before

Hebrew 'שָׂרִיתָ' means to struggle or contend with, and this alternative uses 'contended' instead of 'striven' while also rendering 'אֱלֹהִים' as 'divine beings' rather than simply 'God' to reflect potential ambiguity in the original. 'Overcome' offers a slight variation on 'prevailed.'

[A]Or: "his life as a reparation offering" — 'Asham' specifically refers to a reparation offering in the Temple sacrificial system, which had precise ritual requirements. 'Life' may be preferred over 'soul' for 'nefesh' in this context as it relates to physical sacrifice.

[B]Or: "He was wounded for our transgressions" — The Hebrew 'mecholal' can be translated as either 'pierced' or 'wounded.' While 'pierced' conveys the violence of the imagery more dramatically, 'wounded' might be preferred for a more neutral scholarly translation less influenced by specific theological interpretations.

[C]Or: "the discipline for our wholeness was upon him" — 'Shalom' encompasses more than just 'peace' and includes concepts of wholeness, completeness, and well-being. 'Discipline' might be preferred over 'chastisement' as it better reflects the Hebrew 'musar' which carries connotations of instruction and correction, not merely punishment.

[1]The Hebrew 'asham' refers specifically to a guilt offering in the Temple sacrificial system. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this sacrificial language would be interpreted as describing how the suffering of the righteous can function as a form of atonement, connecting physical illness to spiritual purification.

[2]This description of the suffering servant's unremarkable appearance parallels how illness often diminishes physical beauty and strength. In Ma'avar Yabok's framework, this would suggest that spiritual value transcends physical appearance, particularly relevant for comforting the physically diminished ill.

[3]This paradoxical statement about healing coming through wounds reflects Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework where suffering, properly endured, can lead to spiritual healing and elevation.

[4]This powerful metaphor would be particularly resonant in the context of terminal illness, where Ma'avar Yabok encourages acceptance of divine judgment with dignity and silence.

mandments. This reinforces Ma'avar Yabok's consistent emphasis on repentance and renewed observance as part of the healing process. | Cf. Leviticus 20:7 — This verse connects physical healing to spiritual purification, suggesting that sanctification is both a prerequisite for and result of divine healing. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this encourages the sick person toward spiritual renewal. | Cf. Genesis 32:28 — The inclusion of this verse is particularly significant given the book's title 'Ma'avar Yabok' (Crossing of the Jabbok). It draws a parallel between the sick person's struggle with illness and Jacob's transformative spiritual struggle, suggesting that the current ordeal may lead to spiritual elevation and a new identity.

[i]This verse from Isaiah 53:5 is central to the 'Suffering Servant' passage, which has been interpreted in various ways in Jewish tradition. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would be understood as expressing how the righteous may suffer as atonement not only for their own sins but potentially for others, a concept that gives spiritual meaning to suffering.

[ii]This powerful metaphor comparing the suffering servant to silent animals led to slaughter would resonate particularly in the context of illness and approaching death, where the sick person might be encouraged to accept suffering with dignified silence and submission to divine will.

[A] Or: "I have observed his ways, and I will heal him" — The Hebrew 'ra'iti' means 'I have seen' but in this context implies more than just visual perception, but rather an assessment or evaluation of behavior. 'Observed' might better capture this nuance.

[1] This divine promise of comfort extends not only to the suffering individual but also to those who mourn with them, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's concern for both the ill person and their community of caregivers.

[2] This transformative command represents the hope for both physical recovery and spiritual illumination, which in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework are interconnected aspects of divine healing.

[3] This series of divine transformations symbolizes how suffering can be transmuted into spiritual elevation, a central theme in Ma'avar Yabok's approach to illness as a potentially purifying experience.

[i] This verse marks a transition from confession of sins to divine reassurance, following the pattern seen throughout Ma'avar Yabok where acknowledgment of human failing is balanced with affirmation of divine mercy and covenant promises.

[ii] This familiar verse from Isaiah 60 introduces light imagery that contrasts with the previous focus on suffering. In the context of prayers for healing, this would represent hope for recovery and spiritual illumination emerging from the darkness of illness.

[iii] This metaphor of divine transformation of lesser materials into precious ones would be interpreted in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework as representing how physical suffering can be spiritually elevated, turning the 'bronze' of affliction into the 'gold' of spiritual refinement.

[iv] This appeal to God's parental relationship with Israel creates an intimate framework for the prayer, suggesting that divine compassion, like that of a father, will ultimately prevail over judgment.

[v] Cf. Isaiah 53:10-11 — This passage from Isaiah's 'Suffering Servant' text is incorporated into the prayer sequence for healing the sick in Ma'avar Yabok. In the original biblical context, it describes a righteous figure who suffers on behalf of others. In the liturgical context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses would be recited to provide spiritual comfort to the ill person, connecting

[A] Or: "I wander in my meditation and am troubled" — The Hebrew 'arid' can suggest wandering or roaming thoughts, while 'ahimah' conveys being troubled or disturbed. This alternate captures the mental distress rather than physical restlessness.

[B] Or: "Evening, morning, and noon I meditate and moan" — The term 'asichah' often refers to meditation or contemplative prayer rather than ordinary speech, which better fits the context of prayerful communication with God at the traditional Jewish prayer times.

[1] This expression of feeling divine abandonment would resonate with the seriously ill while still maintaining a framework of appeal to God as Father, preserving hope even in apparent divine absence.

[2] The prayer concludes by invoking God as Redeemer, emphasizing divine redemptive power that transcends current suffering, consistent with Ma'avar Yabok's framework of finding meaning and hope in illness.

[3] The text uses both divine names Elohim (God) and YHVH (the LORD), creating a parallel structure that emphasizes the completeness of divine response to human prayer. This pattern appears frequently in biblical poetry.

their suffering to a divine purpose of purification and spiritual elevation. | Cf. Isaiah 57:18 — This verse expressing divine healing and comfort would be particularly meaningful in a prayer for the sick. Its inclusion in this liturgical sequence reinforces Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework that illness can be a path to spiritual purification followed by divine comfort and restoration. | Cf. Isaiah 59:12 — This verse fits with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on confession (vidui) as an essential component of spiritual healing. In the context of prayers for the sick, this acknowledgment of transgressions would be seen as facilitating divine forgiveness and healing. | Cf. Isaiah 59:21 — This verse of divine reassurance would provide comfort to the sick by affirming God's eternal covenant with Israel. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, it would reassure the ill person of continued divine presence and guidance regardless of their physical condition. | Cf. Isaiah 60:1-2 — These verses metaphorically transform darkness into light, mirroring the desired transformation from illness to health. In Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework, this would represent the spiritual illumination that can emerge from the darkness of suffering. | Cf. Isaiah 60:17 — This verse's promise of transformation would be particularly meaningful in prayers for healing, symbolizing how suffering can be transformed into spiritual elevation. It aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's view that illness, properly approached, can lead to spiritual refinement. | Cf. Isaiah 63:15-16 — These verses appeal to God's parental compassion, which would be particularly appropriate in prayers for the sick. They emphasize the intimate relationship between God and the supplicant, reinforcing Ma'avar Yabok's theme that proper prayer creates a direct channel to divine mercy. | Cf. The Zohar — The selection of these particular prophetic passages reflects the kabbalistic approach of Ma'avar Yabok, which draws heavily on the Zohar. The text's focus on transformation, divine covenant, and the relationship between suffering and spiritual elevation aligns with Zoharic interpretations of illness and healing.

[i] The passage begins with the heading 'Ketuvim' (Writings), indicating that this is a collection of verses from the third section of the Hebrew Bible. This organizational structure follows Ma'avar Yabok's pattern of arranging biblical verses by their source (Torah, Prophets, Writings) within each prayer sequence.

[ii] The Hebrew 'arid' suggests wandering or restless thoughts, while 'ahimah' conveys being troubled or moaning. Together they express the profound spiritual and emotional distress that illness often brings, combining both mental anguish and physical discomfort.

[A] Or: "from the commotion of evildoers" — The Hebrew 'rigshat' refers to a noisy gathering or commotion, which might be more precise than 'tumult' which suggests greater disorder.

[B] Or: "until calamities pass by" — The Hebrew 'havot' is plural in form and often refers to multiple calamities or disasters rather than a single destructive event, which better reflects the ongoing tribulations the psalmist faces.

[1] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences for the sick and dying, this phrase takes on additional significance. It can be understood as referring to physical recovery from life-threatening illness, spiritual salvation regardless of physical outcome, or divine deliverance of the soul after death.

[2] This powerful protective imagery appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences. In kabbalistic interpretation, the 'wings' represent aspects of divine mercy that shelter the vulnerable soul, particularly during transitions like illness and death.

[3] The Hebrew 'dumiyah' (silence/stillness) suggests not merely absence of speech but a profound state of receptive contemplation and trust. In the context of serious illness, this represents the ideal spiritual posture—complete surrender to divine will beyond verbal expression.

[i] This reference to praying three times daily (evening, morning, and noon) corresponds to the traditional Jewish prayer times of Ma'ariv, Shacharit, and Minchah. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this emphasizes maintaining regular prayer cycles even during illness.

[ii] The phrase 'in the light of life' (b'or hachayim) has multiple meanings in this context: it can refer to continued physical life (recovery from illness), spiritual illumination in this world, or the divine light experienced by the soul after death—all relevant to Ma'avar Yabok's focus on the transition between life and death.

[iii] The Hebrew 'havot' (calamities/destruction) appears in plural form, suggesting that the distress of illness is viewed as one of multiple tribulations that will eventually pass. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's perspective that even serious illness is a transitional state rather than a permanent condition.

Order Six 1190R

[A] Or: "He loads us with benefits" — The Hebrew 'ya'amos lanu' can be interpreted positively as God loading us with benefits or blessings, rather than bearing our burdens. This alternate reading is found in some traditional Jewish interpretations.

[1] The Hebrew verb 'ya'amos' has been variously interpreted as 'bears our burden' or 'loads us with benefits.' In the context of illness, both readings are meaningful: God supports us through suffering while also bestowing blessings even amid distress.

[2] This is a standard liturgical instruction in Ma'avar Yabok that appears in each of the eight prayer sequences (sedarim), directing the reader to recite the same concluding prayers after each sequence.

[3] This instruction demonstrates how Ma'avar Yabok creates a systematic structure for prayer, with standardized elements that are repeated across different healing prayer sequences to create consistency in ritual practice.

[i] Cf. Psalm 55 — These verses from Psalm 55 were selected for inclusion in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences because they express the emotional journey from distress to divine trust that the sick or dying person might experience, while emphasizing regular prayer as a source of comfort. | Cf. Psalm 57 — This metaphor of divine protection is particularly powerful in Ma'avar Yabok's context, as it portrays God as sheltering the vulnerable soul of the sick or dying person, creating a sacred space of protection during times of extreme vulnerability. | Cf. Psalm 62 — The selection of these verses emphasizes the spiritual value of silent contemplation and complete trust in God during illness or approaching death. The repetition of 'only' or 'surely' (akh) creates a rhythmic meditation on divine dependability when all else fails. | Cf. Psalm 56 — This verse would be read in Ma'avar Yabok's context as expressing both the hope for physical recovery (walking again) and spiritual salvation (walking in divine light after death), making it particularly appropriate for prayers concerning illness and approaching death. | Cf. Traditional Jewish prayer times — In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this reference would remind the sick person and caregivers of the importance of maintaining regular prayer even during illness, connecting the individual's suffering to the broader communal rhythm of Jewish devotional life.

[ii] Abbreviated as "וגומר" (etc.) indicating that the reader should recite the complete prayer that begins with these words, which would have been familiar to the intended users of this prayer manual.

[iii] This refers to the threefold repetition of "Heal me, O LORD" (רְפָאֵנִי יְיָ) mentioned earlier in the text, which is followed by additional verses forming a healing prayer.

[iv] The phrase "my Rock and my Redeemer" (צוּרִי וְגוֹאֲלִי) comes from Psalm 19:15 and marks the conclusion of this standardized prayer sequence.

[v] Cf. Psalm 19:15 — This reference serves as a standard closing for prayer sequences in Ma'avar Yabok, marking the endpoint of the liturgical section. The use of this verse invokes both divine protection (Rock) and redemption, themes particularly relevant for healing prayers.

[vi] This is the header for the sixth liturgical sequence in Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer system for the sick and dying. The title 'Seder Vav' (Order 6) indicates this is the sixth in a series of eight prayer orders.

A psalm of David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah. O God, You are my God, I seek You earnestly;[A] my soul thirsts for You, my flesh longs for You, in a dry and weary land without water.[B] So I have beheld You in the sanctuary,[5] to see Your power and Your glory. For Your loving-kindness is better than life; my lips shall praise You. So I will bless You as long as I live; in Your name I will lift up my hands. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, and my mouth shall praise You with joyful lips. When I remember You upon my bed, I meditate on You in the night watches. For You 1195R 1200R 1205R

[A] Or: "I seek You at dawn" — The Hebrew word 'אֲשַׁחֲרֶךָּ' comes from the root 'שחר' which relates to dawn or early morning. In context it refers to earnest seeking, but it can also specifically connote seeking God in the early morning hours, which would be relevant in the context of prayer cycles in Ma'avar Yabok.

[B] Or: "in a parched and exhausted land without water" — This more visceral translation of the Hebrew 'צִיָּה וְעָיֵף' emphasizes the physical depletion that parallels the spiritual thirst described in the psalm, which might better convey the metaphorical connection to the condition of illness in Ma'avar Yabok's context.

[1] The Hebrew verb "יתחיל" (yatchil) is in the third-person masculine singular form, creating an impersonal instruction typical of liturgical manuals. I've maintained this formal tone in the translation.

[2] This refers to the previously detailed prayer sequence (Seder Alef) where the complete opening formula was provided. Ma'avar Yabok uses this cross-referencing system throughout to create a practical manual that balances completeness with efficiency.

[3] The text offers a choice between these four psalms, likely because they contain themes appropriate for various situations related to illness or approaching death. This flexibility within structured prayer sequences is characteristic of Ma'avar Yabok.

[4] This phrase (וזאת התורה) comes from Deuteronomy 4:44 and traditionally begins a liturgical sequence recited when the Torah scroll is raised in synagogue. Here it appears to mark the beginning of a new section in this prayer sequence.

[5] The Hebrew 'כֵּן בַּקֹּדֶשׁ חֲזִיתִךָ' can be understood in multiple ways: as referring to past experiences of divine presence in the sanctuary that sustain the psalmist in the desert, or as expressing a wish to see God in the sanctuary as intensely as the current longing in the wilderness.

[i] This is a standard liturgical formula used throughout Ma'avar Yabok as the opening for each prayer sequence. The phrase "וגומר" (etc.) indicates that the full prayer should be recited as previously detailed in the text.

[ii] This refers back to the first prayer order (Seder Alef) where the complete opening formula was written out in full. This cross-referencing technique was common in prayer manuals to save space while ensuring proper recitation.

[iii] These are Hebrew numerical abbreviations for Psalms 63, 67, 71, or 74. The Hebrew letters used as numerals are: ס (samekh) = 60, ג (gimel) = 3, ז (zayin) = 7, ע (ayin) = 70, א (alef) = 1, ד (dalet) = 4.

[iv] "And this is the Torah"—these words begin a standard prayer recited when the Torah is raised in the synagogue, based on Deuteronomy 4:44. In this context, it appears to be the beginning of a specific prayer sequence or biblical verse collection that follows the psalm recitation.

[A] Or: "and under the shelter of Your wings I rejoice" — The phrase 'under the shadow/shelter of Your wings' (בְּצֵל כְּנָפֶיךָ) appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok as a key metaphor for divine protection, particularly for the vulnerable soul during illness and at the moment of death. This translation emphasizes the protective aspect of the metaphor.

[1] The phrase 'תַּחְתִּיּוֹת הָאָרֶץ' (depths of the earth) was traditionally understood as referring to Sheol, the abode of the dead. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this would connect to discussions of the soul's journey after death and divine judgment of the wicked.

[2] The Hebrew term 'binginot' specifically refers to instrumental accompaniment, suggesting that this psalm was meant to be performed with musical instruments rather than merely recited. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this musical dimension might have been understood as having therapeutic properties for the sick.

[3] This phrase echoes the Priestly Blessing (Numbers 6:24-26) and carries profound theological significance. In kabbalistic thought, the 'shining face' of God represents divine favor, illumination, and healing power flowing from higher spiritual realms to the lower world.

[4] The psalm moves immediately from personal blessing to universal salvation, reflecting a pattern in Jewish thought where individual healing is connected to the broader divine plan for all humanity. This universalist perspective would be particularly meaningful for someone facing mortality.

[i] Cf. Psalm 42 — Psalm 42's 'As the deer pants for water brooks, so my soul pants for You, O God' parallels the imagery of thirsting for God in Psalm 63. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses would serve as powerful meditation prompts for the ill person to redirect their physical suffering toward spiritual longing for divine presence. | Cf. Zohar — The Zohar interprets 'in the shadow of Your wings I sing for joy' as referring to divine protection during prayer, particularly at critical moments. In Ma'avar Yabok, this phrase becomes a central metaphor for the protection of the soul during illness and at death, connecting personal prayer with cosmic processes of divine unification. | Cf. Genesis 32 — The phrase 'my soul clings to You' echoes Jacob's statement 'I will not let You go unless You bless me' during his wrestling at the Jabbok River. This connection is especially significant in Ma'avar Yabok, whose title directly references this biblical narrative as a metaphor for the soul's transition from life to death.

[ii] This musical instruction indicates the psalm was intended to be performed with stringed instruments. Its inclusion in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences suggests the therapeutic power of music was recognized alongside the words themselves in healing contexts.

[iii] The imagery of God's 'shining face' is central to Jewish blessing formulas and has particular significance in kabbalistic thought, where divine light is understood as a healing force that can penetrate the darkness of illness and suffering.

[iv] This musical notation appears twice in this short psalm, potentially indicating pauses for reflection or musical interludes. In the context of prayers for healing, these pauses might serve as moments for contemplation or for the sick person to rest.

[v] This verse connects personal blessing with universal divine revelation, suggesting that even in individual suffering, there is a larger purpose of making God's ways known to all people.

In You, O LORD, I have taken refuge; let me never be put to shame. In Your righteousness, deliver me and rescue me; incline Your ear to me and save me. Be to me a rock of habitation to which I may continually come; You have given the commandment to save me, for You are my rock and my fortress. My God, deliver me from the hand of the wicked, from the grasp of the wrongdoer and the oppressor. For You are my hope, O Lord GOD, my confidence from my youth. Upon You I have leaned from birth;[C] from my mother's womb You have been my protector.[D][2] In [A] Or: "Let the peoples rejoice and sing joyfully" — The Hebrew term 'le'umim' can be translated as either 'nations' or 'peoples.' While 'nations' is standard in many translations, 'peoples' might better preserve the parallelism with 'amim' (peoples) in the surrounding verses. Both translations are valid depending on whether one emphasizes political entities or human communities.

[B] Or: "The land has given its harvest" — The Hebrew 'eretz' can mean either 'earth' (globally) or 'land' (more locally), and 'yevulah' can refer to produce, harvest, or increase. This alternative emphasizes the agricultural aspect more directly, which might be more intuitive to modern readers unfamiliar with biblical idioms.

[C] Or: "Upon You I have been supported from the womb" — The Hebrew 'נִסְמַכְתִּי' (nismachti) has a connotation of being supported or upheld rather than simply leaning. The term 'מִבֶּטֶן' (mi-beten) specifically refers to 'from the womb' which is more precise than the general term 'birth'.

[D] Or: "You are my deliverer" — The term 'גּוֹזִי' (gozi) is somewhat rare and has connotations of cutting or severing (possibly from the cord at birth), and in this context implies one who delivers or extracts. 'Deliverer' captures this nuance better than 'protector,' though both convey aspects of the meaning.

[1] The Hebrew term 'mishor' (equity/uprightness) carries connotations of both justice and straightforwardness. In the context of prayers for the sick, this suggests confidence in divine fairness even amid suffering that might seem arbitrary or unjust.

[2] The Hebrew term 'גּוֹזִי' (gozi) is somewhat rare and may derive from a root meaning 'to cut' or 'to shear,' possibly referring to cutting the umbilical cord. This creates a powerful image of God as the one who has delivered the psalmist into life from the very beginning, establishing a lifelong relationship that continues into old age and illness.

[i] The agricultural metaphor of the earth yielding its produce appears in a psalm about divine blessing. In the context of illness and healing prayers, this might suggest that the 'fruit' of suffering could be spiritual growth or that recovery is like the earth's natural process of producing new life.

[ii] Cf. Numbers 6:24-26 — This psalm incorporates language from the Priestly Blessing, which would have been immediately recognizable to Jewish readers. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this connection suggests that the psalm serves as a kind of priestly blessing for the sick or dying person, invoking divine light and grace during their time of need. | Cf. Zohar — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, the phrase 'make His face shine upon us' would be understood as invoking the divine light that has healing and restorative properties according to kabbalistic tradition. The psalm's inclusion in a healing sequence suggests it was selected specifically for this mystical dimension. | Cf. Psalms 117 — Both psalms emphasize universal praise of God by all peoples and nations, suggesting that even in illness or approaching death, the individual participates in a cosmic chorus of praise that extends beyond Israel to all humanity.

[A] Or: "I have become like a portent to many" — The Hebrew 'מוֹפֵת' (mofet) often refers to a sign, portent, or omen rather than merely something that causes wonder. In this context, it suggests the psalmist's suffering has made him an example or sign that others observe with astonishment or as a warning.

[B] Or: "My mouth shall recount Your righteousness and Your salvation all day long, for I do not know their measure" — The phrase 'לֹא יָדַעְתִּי סְפֹרוֹת' (lo yadati seforot) literally means 'I do not know numbers/counting' and implies that the acts of salvation are beyond enumeration. 'I do not know their measure' captures this sense of immeasurability rather than suggesting inability to recount.

[C] Or: "I will enter into the mighty acts of the Lord GOD" — The Hebrew 'אָבוֹא' (avo) literally means 'I will enter/come into' rather than 'come with,' and 'בִּגְבֻרוֹת' (bigvurot) refers to mighty acts or powers. The alternate translation better conveys the sense of the psalmist immersing himself in or proclaiming God's mighty acts.

[1] This prayer against abandonment in old age would be particularly poignant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of caring for the elderly and dying. It reflects the common human fear of being forgotten or abandoned when weakened by age or illness, while expressing confidence that God's care extends throughout the entire lifespan.

[2] This verse expresses confidence in divine restoration, whether from the depths of illness or even from death itself. In Jewish mystical thought, 'the depths of the earth' (תְּהֹמוֹת הָאָרֶץ) can represent both physical death and spiritual descent, with the promise of elevation representing both healing and resurrection.

[A] Or: "A maskil of Asaph" — The Hebrew term 'maskil' (מַשְׂכִּיל) is a musical or literary term whose precise meaning is uncertain. While 'contemplative psalm' is a good interpretive translation, retaining the technical term 'maskil' might be preferable in a scholarly context.

[B] Or: "to the everlasting desolations" — The Hebrew 'משואות' can refer to ruins or desolations, and 'נצח' can mean perpetual, everlasting, or complete. This alternate translation emphasizes the total destruction referenced in the psalm.

[1] The concept of the soul being 'redeemed' (פָּדִיתָ) carries significant weight in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework. It suggests not merely rescue from danger but spiritual liberation and restoration to divine connection, which aligns with the book's focus on proper spiritual preparation for death as the soul's ultimate redemption.

[2] The Hebrew term 'mo'adekha' refers to appointed meeting places, particularly the Temple or synagogues. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this could be understood metaphorically as the sacred space of prayer where the sick person encounters divine presence.

[i] Cf. Psalm 31 — The opening verses of Psalm 71 deliberately echo Psalm 31, establishing a connection between two prayers for deliverance. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this reinforces the practice of reciting familiar psalms during illness or at the approach of death, creating spiritual comfort through recognized patterns of prayer. | Cf. Psalm 22:9-10 — The reference to being supported by God from the womb echoes Psalm 22's similar imagery, creating a pattern of lifelong divine protection that would be particularly meaningful in Ma'avar Yabok's context of end-of-life care. This reminds the ill person that the same God who has sustained them throughout life will continue to support them through death's transition. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — Verse 20 refers to being brought up from 'the depths of the earth' which parallels the central metaphor of Ma'avar Yabok—crossing over from one state to another. This psalm would thus serve as a particularly appropriate text for meditation during illness, reinforcing the book's theme that God who has sustained one throughout life will facilitate the crossing from life to death. | Cf. Zohar — The psalm's mention of 'my soul, which You have redeemed' (verse 23) would resonate with Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework concerning the soul's journey and redemption. In this context, the psalm serves not just as a prayer for physical healing but for the soul's proper elevation through the cosmic realms, a central concern of the book.

[ii] The term 'maskil' appears in the titles of 13 psalms. While traditionally translated as 'contemplative psalm' or 'instructive psalm,' its exact musical or liturgical meaning remains uncertain. In kabbalistic interpretation, it refers to a special type of contemplation that penetrates divine mysteries.

[A] Or: "Let us oppress them altogether" — The Hebrew is difficult here and there are textual variants. The verb could be derived from different roots meaning either 'destroy' or 'oppress/subdue.' The context supports either reading.

[B] Or: "the life of Your dove to the predator" — The term 'tor' (תּוֹר) refers to a turtledove or dove, often used metaphorically for Israel. 'Nefesh' can be translated as either 'soul' or 'life', while 'chayat' refers to a beast or predator. This alternate translation is more direct and maintains the metaphor.

[1] The psalm's emphasis on God's cosmic power over nature would be read in Ma'avar Yabok's context as reassurance that the one who established the fundamental laws of creation also has power over illness and death.

[2] This metaphor of Israel as God's vulnerable turtledove parallels how Ma'avar Yabok often portrays the sick person—as vulnerable and in need of divine protection. This imagery would resonate particularly in the context of prayers for the ill.

[3] This appeal to God's covenant serves as a model for how the sick should approach divine mercy—not based on personal merit but on the established relationship between God and Israel. Ma'avar Yabok frequently employs this covenant-based approach in its healing prayers.

[i] This references the ancient Near Eastern combat myth where a deity defeats sea monsters, representing chaos. In Jewish tradition, this was reinterpreted as God's victory over Egypt at the Red Sea crossing, symbolized as monstrous forces opposed to divine order.

[ii] The turtledove (tor) serves as a metaphor for Israel in Song of Songs and other biblical texts, representing vulnerability and beloved status. This metaphor would be significant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of vulnerability during illness.

[iii] The appeal to covenant is a central motif in Jewish prayers for healing and protection. The psalmist reminds God of the binding agreement between them as grounds for divine intervention, a strategy also employed in traditional Jewish deathbed prayers.

He will love you, bless you, and multiply you; He will also bless 1325R

[A] Or: "the dark places of the land are filled with haunts of violence" — The Hebrew 'eretz' can mean either 'earth' or 'land' (referring specifically to Israel), and 'ne'ot' refers to dwellings or haunts. This alternate translation is more concrete and may better capture the geographic specificity.

[B] Or: "I will move about in your midst" — This more literal rendering emphasizes God's immanent presence among the people, which in the context of Ma'avar Yabok would highlight divine attendance at the sickbed. This might be preferred in contexts focusing on God's intimate presence with the suffering.

[1] This opening serves to frame what follows as sacred text with divine authority. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses are presented as spiritual medicine with healing properties.

[2] The Shema is Judaism's central declaration of faith and is traditionally recited before death. Its inclusion here reflects Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on maintaining focus on divine unity even during serious illness.

[3] This verse suggests that righteous observance of commandments contributes to healing, reflecting the book's view that proper spiritual conduct can influence physical wellbeing.

[i] Cf. Lamentations — This psalm shares the same historical context as Lamentations—the destruction of the Temple. The use of similar language and imagery would have been recognized by readers of Ma'avar Yabok as drawing upon the traditional Jewish literature of mourning and exile. | Cf. Zohar — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm would be understood through a kabbalistic lens where the destruction of the Temple represents not just a historical tragedy but a cosmic disruption in which divine presence itself is exiled. The imagery of God's 'right hand' being withdrawn relates to kabbalistic concepts of divine attributes being concealed. | Cf. Exodus narrative — The psalm deliberately contrasts God's past salvific actions with the present situation of apparent divine abandonment. In Ma'avar Yabok, this would serve as a model for how to approach personal tragedy—by remembering God's past interventions as grounds for hope amid current suffering. | Cf. Traditional Jewish prayers for the sick — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm's inclusion in a liturgical sequence for the sick teaches that personal illness can be understood through the lens of communal suffering and exile. The petitionary structure offers a model for how to approach God during times of physical distress, moving from lament to petition based on covenant relationship.

[ii] This phrase opens a new section in the sixth liturgical order (Seder Vav) of Ma'avar Yabok. By beginning with this declaration about the Torah, the text establishes the divine authority of the biblical verses that follow and frames them as part of sacred instruction that brings healing.

[iii] The Shema, Judaism's central declaration of monotheistic faith, holds special significance in the context of illness and approaching death. In Jewish tradition, it is recited as one's final words when possible, and in Ma'avar Yabok it serves to focus the ill person on divine unity.

[A] Or: "He will bless the offspring of your body" — This alternative avoids gender-specific language while maintaining the biblical concept. It might be preferred in contexts where gender-neutral language is prioritized.

[B] Or: "the calving of your herds and the lambing of your flocks" — This more specific translation captures the Hebrew terms that refer to the birthing or reproductive capacity of livestock. This might be preferred in contexts where the emphasis on fertility and reproduction is important to the interpretation.

[1] This final verse, which forms the basis for the Jewish grace after meals (Birkat Hamazon), reminds the ill person to maintain gratitude even in suffering. In Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework, acknowledging divine goodness despite affliction is part of the healing process.

[2] This potter-clay metaphor establishes the relationship between God and humanity, serving as the theological foundation for the prayer's subsequent appeals. It acknowledges divine sovereignty while implicitly suggesting that suffering may be part of the divine shaping process.

[3] This petition acknowledges the appropriateness of divine correction while requesting moderation, perfectly aligning with Ma'avar Yabok's view of illness as potentially corrective rather than merely punitive. The supplicant accepts discipline but asks that it be measured.

[i] This covenant formula, "I will be your God and you will be My people," appears frequently in the Hebrew Bible and establishes the reciprocal relationship between God and Israel. In the context of illness, it serves as a reminder that even in suffering, the covenant relationship remains intact.

[ii] This verse forms the biblical basis for Birkat Hamazon, the Jewish grace after meals. Its inclusion in a healing sequence suggests that gratitude for divine provision should extend even through times of illness, with the hope of returning to normal activities like eating and blessing afterward.

[iii] Cf. Deuteronomy 4:44 — This opening verse establishes that the following text consists of sacred Torah passages, giving them authority as divine instruction for healing the sick. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:4 — The inclusion of the Shema in this healing sequence is significant as it's traditionally recited before death. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, it serves to focus the ill person on divine unity during their suffering. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:25 — This verse suggests that healing may come through righteous observance of divine commandments, aligning with Ma'avar Yabok's view that illness can be a spiritual test. | Cf. Leviticus 26:12 — This divine promise of presence would be especially comforting to the ill, suggesting that God walks among them even in their suffering. | Cf. Deuteronomy 7:13-14 — These blessing verses serve as both a prayer for physical restoration and a reminder of God's covenant promises that extend to bodily wellbeing. | Cf. Deuteronomy 8:10 — This verse, the basis for the Jewish grace after meals, reminds the ill person to maintain gratitude even in suffering, acknowledging God's past and future provision.

[iv] The potter metaphor (God as potter, humans as clay) establishes a theological framework for understanding suffering: just as a potter shapes clay according to his design, God may use suffering to shape human lives. This biblical image was often invoked when seeking divine mercy during illness.

Why should You be like a man confused, like a mighty man who cannot save? Yet You, O LORD, are in our midst, and Your name is called upon us; do not leave us. Heal me, O LORD, and I shall be healed;[3] save me, and I shall be saved, for You are my praise. Do not be a terror to me; You are my refuge in the day of adversity. Let my persecutors be put to shame, but let me not be put to shame; let them be dismayed, but let me not be dismayed. Bring upon them the day of evil and destroy them with double destruction. Listen to me, O LORD, and hear the voice of my adversaries. But the LORD is with me as a dread warrior; therefore my persecutors will stumble; they will not overcome me. They will be greatly ashamed, for they will not succeed. Their eternal dishonor will never be forgotten. For I know the thoughts that I think toward you, says the LORD, thoughts of peace and not of evil,[4] to give

[1] This invocation combines two divine titles that would have particular resonance for the sick: God as both "Hope" (future possibility) and "Savior" (present deliverer). These titles establish expectation of divine response even when God seems distant.

[2] The imagery of God as a disinterested traveler expresses the profound sense of divine absence often experienced during serious illness. The prayer boldly gives voice to the sick person's feelings of abandonment while still maintaining the dialogue with God.

[3] This direct appeal from Jeremiah 17:14 becomes the central petition of this prayer sequence. The parallel structure (heal/healed, save/saved) emphasizes complete dependence on divine action, with human healing following as a natural consequence of divine intervention.

[4] The prayer concludes with divine reassurance from Jeremiah 29:11, shifting from human petition

[i] The Hebrew term תַּמְעִטֵנִי (diminish me) can mean to reduce in number or size, but in this context refers to being brought to nothing or utterly destroyed. The prayer acknowledges the legitimacy of divine discipline while asking that it be measured rather than overwhelming.

[ii] The term מִקְוֵה (mikveh) has a double meaning in Hebrew: "hope" and also "ritual bath." While primarily meaning "hope" here, the water imagery resonates with the concept of purification through suffering that appears throughout Ma'avar Yabok.

[iii] The Hebrew נִדְהָם (confused/astonished) portrays God as seemingly inactive or bewildered, a bold anthropomorphism expressing the supplicant's sense of divine absence during illness. This reflects the existential struggle of the sick person who feels God's absence despite theological affirmation of divine presence.

[iv] The phrase "double destruction" (literally "double breaking") reflects the biblical principle of dual retribution found in passages like Jeremiah 16:18 and Isaiah 40:2. In the context of healing prayers, this might metaphorically represent the elimination of both physical illness and its spiritual causes.

[v] The phrase כְּגִבּוֹר עָרִיץ (as a dread warrior) presents God as a fearsome warrior fighting on behalf of the supplicant. This martial imagery contrasts with the earlier portrayal of God as seemingly inactive, showing the prayer's progression from doubt to confidence.

[vi] Cf. Isaiah 64:8 — This reference establishes the relationship between God and humans as creator and creation, which serves as a foundation for the subsequent appeals for mercy in this prayer sequence. | Cf. Jeremiah 10:6-7 — This reference establishes God's supreme power and you a future and a hope.

[A] Or: "with the supporters of my soul" — This alternative translation emphasizes the human caregivers who might be present with the ill person, rather than placing God among them. This interpretation would be relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context where proper attendance of the sick is emphasized.

[B] Or: "Your salvation, O God, will protect me" — The verb 'תְּשַׂגְּבֵנִי' can connote protection rather than elevation. This alternate translation emphasizes divine protection during illness rather than exaltation, which might be more immediately relevant to the suffering person.

to God's perspective. This creates a therapeutic progression from distress through petition to confidence, exemplifying Ma'avar Yabok's approach of using prayer to transform the sick person's spiritual outlook from despair to hope.

[1] In the original context of Psalm 70, this referred to human enemies seeking one's life. In Ma'avar Yabok's context for the ill, it would be understood as referring to spiritual forces of illness or death that threaten the soul's wellbeing.

uniqueness, creating a theological foundation for the subsequent appeals for divine intervention and healing. | Cf. Jeremiah 10:24 — This reference aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework that views illness as divine correction rather than mere punishment, acknowledging the need for discipline while requesting mercy. | Cf. Jeremiah 14:7-9 — These verses express both communal confession of sin and puzzlement at God's apparent distance, reflecting the book's approach to illness as potentially linked to sin while still expressing confidence in divine presence. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This direct appeal for healing is particularly appropriate in Ma'avar Yabok's context of prayers for the sick, expressing both need and confidence in divine healing power. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:17-18 — These verses shift from requesting personal protection to seeking judgment on adversaries, possibly representing in Ma'avar Yabok's context a prayer against both illness and negative spiritual forces. | Cf. Jeremiah 18:19 — This brief petition continues the theme of seeking divine intervention against opposition, which in the context of healing prayers might represent both human and spiritual adversaries. | Cf. Jeremiah 20:11 — This verse transforms the prayer from petition to confident assertion of divine presence and protection, exemplifying the pattern in Ma'avar Yabok's prayers of moving from distress to confidence. | Cf. Jeremiah 29:11 — This concluding verse shifts to God's perspective, offering reassurance of divine benevolence and future hope despite present suffering, perfectly aligning with Ma'avar Yabok's therapeutic approach to illness.

[i] This phrase can be interpreted in two ways: 'among those who sustain my soul' or 'with those who sustain my soul,' suggesting both divine companionship with human caregivers and divine presence among those helping the ill person.

[ii] The Hebrew contains a spelling irregularity in the word 'תִּתְעַלַּם' (hide yourself), which lacks the expected letter 'א'. This may be a scribal variation or intentional abbreviation common in prayer texts.

And afterward he shall say[B] "That Your beloved ones may be delivered, etc."[3] "Heal me, O LORD,

[A] Or: "Please give a pledge for me" — The Hebrew term can be understood as asking God to provide assurance rather than making the petitioner a guarantor. This interpretation makes more contextual sense in a prayer where the ill person is seeking divine intervention rather than offering to serve as surety.

[B] Or: "And then he shall recite" — The verb 'יאמר' can be translated as either 'say' or 'recite' in liturgical contexts. While 'say' is more literal, 'recite' might better convey the formal, ritual nature of the prayer instruction.

[1] This powerful line from Psalm 73:28 represents the culmination of the prayer's spiritual journey—from distress and supplication to intimate divine connection. It exemplifies Ma'avar Yabok's approach of guiding the ill person toward deeper spiritual awareness even amid suffering.

[2] This concluding section from Psalm 73 represents a spiritual transformation from the distressed supplications that began the prayer. The sequence models the journey Ma'avar Yabok hopes to facilitate for the ill—from desperate plea to confident trust.

[3] This is a standardized opening formula used throughout Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences, quoting the beginning of Psalm 60:7. The 'etc.' indicates that the complete verse would be recited, though not written out in full in the manual.

[i] This is an idiomatic expression from Job referring to a handshake that seals an agreement, literally 'who will strike hands with me.' In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it represents the ill person seeking divine assurance or covenant protection.

[ii] Cf. Psalms — This compilation follows a pattern seen throughout Ma'avar Yabok, where selected verses from various psalms are combined to create a structured prayer for the sick and dying. The selection moves from pleas for divine attention to expressions of trust in divine salvation, modeling a therapeutic spiritual progression from distress to confidence. | Cf. Proverbs 18:10 — This verse is incorporated to emphasize divine protection in times of vulnerability, particularly relevant for the sick who seek refuge in God's power. In Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework, divine names have special protective properties. | Cf. Job 22:25-27 — These verses from Job are repurposed in this healing prayer to provide comfort to the ill, suggesting that God will restore both spiritual and material wellbeing. | Cf. Job 13:21-22 — These verses from Job's dialogue with God are incorporated as expressions of the sick person's desire for relief from suffering, while seeking divine assurance.

[iii] This phrase comes from Psalm 60:7 and appears to be a standard opening formula for the concluding section of each prayer sequence in Ma'avar Yabok. The abbreviation 'וגו׳' indicates that the full verse would be familiar to users and doesn't need to be written out completely.

[A] Or: "according to the complete prayer sequence written above" — The term 'סדר' specifically refers to a liturgical sequence or arrangement in this context. This alternative translation makes the liturgical nature of the instruction more explicit.

[B] Or: "Begin by reciting "Please, O LORD..." etc. as previously written" — This alternative provides a slightly more explicit instruction about the recitation process. While both translations accurately convey the meaning, this version emphasizes the verbal action of recitation.

[1] This phrase from Jeremiah 17:14 is part of a standardized healing prayer that appears in multiple places throughout Ma'avar Yabok, typically with instructions to recite it three times.

[2] This phrase from Psalm 19:15 serves as the standard conclusion to each of the eight prayer sequences in the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok, creating a consistent liturgical framework while allowing variation in the specific psalms recited within each sequence.

[3] The flexibility to choose from four different psalms demonstrates Ma'avar Yabok's approach of providing options appropriate for various situations related to illness. Psalm 91 in particular was known as 'Shir Shel Pega'im' (Song of Afflictions) and was considered especially powerful for protection against harmful forces.

[4] This refers to a prayer beginning with 'Lishu'atkha kiviti Hashem' (For Your salvation I hope, O LORD), which appears to be a standard transitional formula in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences. This creates a structured progression from psalms to the biblical verse collections that typically follow.

[i] From Jeremiah 17:14, this healing verse is presented elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok with instructions to recite it three times, showing its importance in the prayer sequence for the sick.

[ii] This phrase indicates that the entire prayer sequence described earlier in the text should be recited. Ma'avar Yabok often uses such cross-references to avoid repeating lengthy prayer formulas.

[iii] From Psalm 19:15, this phrase serves as the standard conclusion to each prayer sequence in Ma'avar Yabok. The apostrophe after the word indicates the end of a section in the Hebrew manuscript.

[iv] Cf. Psalm 60:7 — This verse serves as a standard opening formula for the concluding section of each prayer sequence in Ma'avar Yabok, establishing the purpose of these prayers as seeking divine deliverance. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This verse is presented in Ma'avar Yabok as part of a standardized healing prayer sequence for the sick, with the instruction to recite it three times, emphasizing its importance in the healing liturgy. | Cf. Psalm 19:15 — This verse serves as the standard conclusion to each of the prayer sequences in Ma'avar Yabok, creating a consistent liturgical framework. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's 'Seder' section — This repeated instruction demonstrates how Ma'avar Yabok creates standardized prayer structures for healing the sick, with consistent opening and closing formulas while allowing variation in the specific psalms and verses recited between them.

[v] The heading 'Seder Zayin' (Order 7) indicates this is the seventh of eight structured liturgical sequences in Ma'avar Yabok designed for healing the sick and comforting the dying.

[vi] This is a liturgical instruction directing the reader to begin with the standard opening formula that starts with 'Ana Hashem' (Please, O LORD) which was provided in full earlier in the text. The abbreviation 'וגו׳" (etc.) indicates that the reader should recite the complete formula as previously given without needing to repeat it in full here.

[vii] This gives the reader options to recite one of four specific psalms: 85 (a psalm about divine forgiveness and restoration), 87 (about Zion as God's beloved city), 91 (known as 'Shir Shel Pega'im' or 'Song of Afflictions,' traditionally recited for protection), or 102 (a prayer of the afflicted). The choice likely depends on the specific circumstances of the sick person.

(Psalm 85) For the Chief Musician. A Psalm of the sons of Korah. You have favored, O LORD, Your land;[1] You have restored the captivity of Jacob.[A] You have forgiven the iniquity of Your people; You have covered all their sin. Selah. You have withdrawn all Your wrath; You have turned away from the heat of Your anger. Restore us, O God of our salvation, and annul Your anger with us. Will You be angry with us forever? Will You prolong Your anger from generation to generation? Will You not revive us again,[2] that Your people may rejoice in You? Show us, O LORD, Your loving kindness, and grant us Your salvation. I will hear what God the LORD will speak, for He will speak peace to His people and to His faithful ones, so that they do not return to folly.[B] Surely His salvation is near to those who fear Him, that glory

[A] Or: "You have returned the fortunes of Jacob" — The phrase could also be translated as 'returning the fortunes' rather than specifically referring to captivity. This alternate translation emphasizes restoration of prosperity rather than literal return from exile, which might be more appropriate in contexts focusing on healing and restoration rather than national redemption.

[B] Or: "let them not return to foolishness" — This alternative more directly captures the imperative tone of the Hebrew, emphasizing the warning against returning to foolishness after experiencing divine forgiveness and restoration, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper spiritual response to divine healing.

[1] The Hebrew verb רָצִיתָ literally means 'you have favored' or 'you have been pleased with,' suggesting divine approval returning to the land after a period of judgment.

[2] This verse is particularly significant in the context of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, as it directly petitions God for revival or restoration of life, making it especially appropriate for healing prayers.

[i] This indicates that after reciting the chosen psalm, one should say a prayer beginning with 'For Your salvation...' This appears to be a transitional formula used in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences, connecting psalm recitations to biblical verse collections that follow.

[ii] Cf. Psalm 91 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm would be understood as providing special spiritual protection for the sick or dying person against negative spiritual forces that might interfere with proper healing or the soul's peaceful transition. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's opening prayer formula — The book creates a consistent liturgical structure through repeated elements like this opening formula, allowing for variation in the psalm selections while maintaining a recognizable framework for those using the prayer manual.

[iii] The text contains a textual variant marked by parentheses and brackets. The word שבות (shevut) appears in parentheses, while the corrected or preferred reading שְׁבִית (shevit) appears in brackets. Both terms refer to captivity or exile, but the bracketed form is the standard Masoretic reading.

[iv] The term 'Selah' (סֶלָה) appears frequently in psalms and is traditionally understood as a musical or liturgical direction, possibly indicating a pause or musical interlude. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these musical notations would still be recited as part of the text when reading these psalms for the sick.

[v] This verse describes the meeting of divine attributes (loving kindness and truth, righteousness and peace), which in kabbalistic interpretation represents the balancing of different sefirot or divine emanations. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this harmony of divine attributes would be understood as the ideal spiritual state that creates healing and restoration.

(Psalm 86) A prayer of David. Incline Your ear, O LORD, answer me, for I am poor and needy. Guard my soul, for I am devoted;[A4] save Your servant, You, my God, who trusts in You. Be gracious to me, O Lord, for to You I call all day long. Gladden the soul of Your servant, for to You, O Lord, I lift up my soul. For You, O Lord, are good and forgiving, abundant in kindness to all who call upon You. Give ear, O LORD, to my prayer, and attend to the voice of my supplications. In the day of my distress I call upon You, for You will answer me. There is none like You among the gods, O Lord, and there are no works 1425R 1430R

[A] Or: "pious" — The Hebrew term 'chasid' can refer to one who is devoted, pious, faithful, or godly. In this context, it refers to someone who maintains faithful devotion to God, which could be rendered as 'pious' to emphasize the religious dimension of this devotion.

[1] The Hebrew word for 'glory' (כבוד/kavod) is frequently associated in kabbalistic texts with the divine presence. In the context of healing prayers, this would suggest the restoration of divine presence that brings healing.

[2] In kabbalistic thought, as reflected in Ma'avar Yabok, 'loving kindness' (חסד/chesed) and 'truth' (אמת/emet, often associated with judgment/din) represent different divine attributes or sefirot. Their meeting symbolizes the balancing of mercy and judgment that is particularly sought during illness.

[3] This poetic image of divine attributes kissing would be understood in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework as representing the perfect harmony of seemingly opposing divine qualities—judgment (righteousness) and mercy (peace)—that creates healing and restoration.

[4] The Hebrew term 'chasid' (translated here as 'devoted') carries connotations of piety, faithfulness, and loving devotion to God. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse would be understood as the ill person claiming a special relationship with God as the basis for divine protection.

[i] Cf. Psalm 85 — This psalm appears in the second liturgical order (Seder B) of Ma'avar Yabok as one of several psalms specifically recommended for recitation by or for the sick. Its themes of divine forgiveness, restoration, and renewal make it particularly appropriate for those seeking healing, as it creates a framework of hope that divine mercy will overcome judgment. | Cf. Job 33:19-30 — The reference to being 'revived again' in Psalm 85:7 resonates with Ma'avar Yabok's framing of illness as divine correction that can lead to restoration, similar to Elihu's speech in Job where he describes how God brings people to the edge of death but then restores them when they properly respond to divine discipline. | Cf. Zohar on Divine Attributes — The meeting of 'loving kindness and truth' and the kissing of 'righteousness and peace' in verses 11-12 represents the kabbalistic concept of balanced divine attributes that Ma'avar Yabok frequently references. This imagery of divine attributes in harmonious relationship would be interpreted in the book's kabbalistic framework as representing the ideal balance between judgment (truth/righteousness) and mercy (loving kindness/peace) that the sick person hopes to experience.

[ii] This superscription identifies the psalm as 'A prayer of David.' In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this attribution would have special significance as King David was considered an exemplary model for proper prayer, especially in times of distress.

בְּצֵל שַׁדַּי יִתְלוֹנָן[iv]: אֹמַר לַיהוָה

(Psalm 91) He who dwells in the shelter of the Most High will abide in the shadow of the Almighty. I will

[A] Or: "from the nethermost pit" — The Hebrew phrase refers specifically to the lowest depths of Sheol (the underworld). This alternate translation emphasizes the spatial dimension of the deepest part of the underworld, which might be clearer for readers unfamiliar with the concept of Sheol.

[B] Or: "the child of Your maidservant" — This biblical expression refers to one born into service to God. The alternate translation uses gender-neutral language while preserving the meaning of one who belongs to God's household through maternal lineage.

[1] This phrase about unifying the heart would have special resonance in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework, where spiritual fragmentation was considered a consequence of sin, and unification (yichud) of heart, mind, and soul was a primary spiritual goal, especially when facing death.

[2] In the context of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, this request for a 'sign for good' would be interpreted as a plea for visible evidence of healing or divine favor that would both encourage the ill person and demonstrate God's power to onlookers.

[i] The term 'Sheol tachtiyah' (lowest Sheol) refers to the deepest part of the underworld in biblical cosmology. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would be interpreted as referring to both physical death and spiritual peril, making this psalm particularly appropriate for those facing serious illness.

[ii] This is a partial citation of the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (Exodus 34:6-7), which held special significance in Jewish prayer traditions, particularly for seeking divine forgiveness and healing. The recitation of these divine attributes was considered especially powerful in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework.

[iii] Cf. Book of Psalms — This is a direct quotation of Psalm 86, which appears in the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok as one of several psalms specifically recommended for recitation by or for the sick. Its themes of divine mercy, protection, and plea for salvation make it particularly appropriate in the context of illness and approaching death. | Cf. Traditional Jewish liturgy — This psalm is part of a structured prayer sequence in Ma'avar Yabok designed for healing the sick and comforting the dying. It appears in the fifth liturgical order (Seder Hei), as noted in the context. The inclusion of complete psalms in these sequences provides ready-made prayers for those attending the sick. | Cf. Zohar — Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework would interpret the reference to 'lifting up my soul' (verse 4) as connecting to the mystical concept of elevating one's soul to higher spiritual realms during prayer, particularly relevant during illness when the soul's connection to the body is weakened.

[iv] The metaphor of divine protection under shadow or wings appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok as a key image of divine care for the vulnerable soul during illness and at the moment of death.

[1]This psalm was considered particularly powerful for protection during illness and at the moment of death. In the kabbalistic framework of Ma'avar Yabok, these divine 'wings' represent the sheltering presence of the Shekhinah (Divine Presence) that protects the vulnerable soul.

[2]The Hebrew term 'ketev' refers to a specific destructive force or demon associated with midday in rabbinic literature. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm's enumeration of dangers at different times of day would be understood as comprehensive protection against all harmful spiritual forces that might threaten the ill or dying person.

[3]This divine promise of presence during trouble was particularly meaningful in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, where it would be understood as God's companionship during the soul's difficult transition from life to death.

[i]The Hebrew term 'dever' (plague/pestilence) held particular resonance for readers in early modern Italy, who faced recurring plague epidemics. Ma'avar Yabok was published in 1626, shortly after major outbreaks in northern Italy.

[ii]The military imagery of shield and buckler would be understood in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic context as representing divine attributes that provide spiritual protection during the vulnerable moments of illness and death.

[iii]This verse refers to destruction at noon, which rabbinic tradition associated with specific demons active at midday. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, these references to harmful forces at different times of day reflect the belief that the dying were particularly vulnerable to negative spiritual entities.

[iv]Cf. Zohar — In Ma'avar Yabok's context, Psalm 91 is known as 'shir shel pega'im' (Song of Afflictions) and is recited for its protective properties, especially for the sick and dying. The Zohar identifies this psalm as having special power against harmful spiritual forces. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This psalm appears in the fifth liturgical order (Seder Hei) of Ma'avar Yabok as one of several psalms specifically recommended for recitation by or for the sick. Its themes of divine protection make it particularly appropriate in the context of illness and approaching death. | Cf. Talmud — The Talmud refers to Psalm 91 as 'shir shel pega'im' (Song of Afflictions/Demons) and recommends its recitation for protection against harmful forces. In Ma'avar Yabok, this protective function is applied specifically to the context of illness and death.

(Psalm 102) A prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed[2] and pours out his complaint before the LORD. O LORD, hear my prayer, and let my cry come to You. Do not hide Your face from me in the day of my distress; incline Your ear to me; on the 1485R day I call, answer me quickly. For my days vanish like smoke, and my bones burn like a hearth.[3] My heart is stricken and withered like grass, for I have forgotten to eat my bread. Because of the sound of my groaning, my bones cling to my flesh. I am like 1490R a pelican of the wilderness; I have become like an owl of the ruins.[A] I keep watch and have become like a solitary bird on a rooftop. All day my enemies taunt me; those who mock me use my name as a curse.[B] For I have eaten ashes like bread and mingled 1495R my drink with weeping, because of Your indignation and Your wrath, for You have lifted me up and cast me away. My days are like a lengthened shadow, and I wither away like grass. But You, O LORD, are enthroned forever, and Your remembrance is from 1500R generation to generation. You will arise and have mercy on Zion, for it is time to favor her; the appointed time has come. For Your servants take pleasure in her stones and show favor to her dust. The

[A] Or: "I resemble a desert owl; I have become like an owl among ruins" — The Hebrew 'קָאַת' (qa'at) is a bird whose exact identification is uncertain. While traditionally translated as 'pelican,' many modern scholars suggest it more likely refers to a type of owl or desert bird. This alternate translation reflects that scholarly consensus while maintaining the poetic parallel structure.

[B] Or: "those who rage against me swear by me" — The Hebrew 'מְהוֹלָלַי' (meholalai) can be understood either as 'those who mock/deride me' or 'those who are mad/rage against me.' The phrase 'בִּי נִשְׁבָּעוּ' literally means 'swear by me' and contextually suggests using the psalmist's name in oaths or curses. This alternate translation stays closer to the literal Hebrew while preserving the sense of being used as a negative example.

[1] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, 'salvation' (yeshuah) extends beyond physical healing to encompass the soul's successful journey after death—precisely the transition that the book's title 'Crossing of the Yabok' metaphorically represents.

[2] The Hebrew 'יַעֲטֹף' (ya'atof) literally means 'to be wrapped up' or 'to faint/grow feeble.' In the context of illness and approaching death, this refers to someone completely enveloped by suffering and weakness, which explains why this psalm was included in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences for the sick.

[3] This vivid physical description of wasting illness would have particular relevance for the dying person, comparing life's brevity to dissipating smoke and describing the burning fever sensation often experienced in serious illness. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this would be understood as both literal suffering and a spiritual process of purification.

[i] This verse uses powerful imagery of consuming ashes and tears that would resonate with mourning practices. Ashes were traditionally associated with mourning in ancient Israel, while the mixing of tears with drink graphically depicts overwhelming grief.

nations will fear the name of the LORD, and all the kings of the earth Your glory. For the LORD has built up Zion; He has appeared in His glory. He has regarded the prayer of the destitute and has not despised their prayer.[A] This will be written for a generation to come, and a people yet to be created will praise the LORD. For He looked down from His holy height; from heaven the LORD gazed upon the earth, to hear the groaning of the prisoner, to release those condemned to death, to declare the name of the LORD in Zion and His praise in Jerusalem, when peoples and kingdoms gather together to serve the LORD.[1] He has weakened my strength in the way; He has shortened my days. I said, "O my God, do not take me away in the midst of my days; Your years are throughout all generations." Of old You laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of Your hands. They will perish, but You will endure; indeed, all of them will wear out like a garment; like clothing You will change them, and they will pass away. But You are the same, and Your years will not end. The children of Your servants will dwell securely, and their offspring will be established before You.

[A] Or: "He has turned to the prayer of the stripped bare and has not disdained their supplication" — The Hebrew 'הָעַרְעָר' (ha'ar'ar) is relatively rare and refers to someone completely stripped of resources or utterly exposed. 'Destitute' captures the meaning, but 'stripped bare' might better convey the vivid image of complete vulnerability in the original. This provides a more evocative translation that could resonate with the sick or dying person for whom this psalm was intended.

[1] The psalm moves from intense personal suffering to universal cosmic hope, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's approach of placing individual death within a larger framework of ultimate redemption. This eschatological vision provides comfort by suggesting that present suffering is temporary within God's eternal plan.

[i] This verse expresses an eschatological hope for universal worship of God, where all nations gather together in divine service. This theme of ultimate redemption provides comfort in the context of present suffering.

[ii] The text shows a scribal correction. The original text had 'כחו' (his strength) but was corrected to 'כֹּחִי' (my strength), as indicated by the square brackets. This reflects the careful textual transmission practices in Hebrew manuscripts.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — Psalm 102 was specifically selected for inclusion in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences because of its themes of profound physical suffering, mortality awareness, and ultimate hope in divine mercy. These themes resonated with the book's purpose of providing spiritual comfort for the sick and dying. | Cf. Zohar — In the kabbalistic framework of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm's imagery of suffering followed by divine mercy would be interpreted as representing the transformation of judgment (din) to compassion (rachamim), which is a central theme in Jewish mystical approaches to illness and death. | Cf. Talmud Bavli — This talmudic interpretation would be particularly relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context, as it provides reassurance that God hears the prayers of the ill and dying, which is a core theological message of the book's prayer sequences.

The LORD your God was unwilling to listen to Balaam, and the LORD your God turned the curse into a blessing for you, because the LORD your God loves you. You shall fear the LORD your God, serve Him, cling to Him,[A] and swear by His name. For I will proclaim the name of the LORD; ascribe greatness to our God. How fortunate you are, O Israel! [A] Or: "cleave to Him" — The traditional translation 'cleave to Him' might be preferred in religious contexts as it maintains the archaic religious language that conveys the intensely binding relationship described by the Hebrew 'tidback'. Both translations are accurate, but 'cleave' has deeper religious resonance in English translations of biblical material.

[B] Or: "Your enemies will submit themselves to you" — The Hebrew verb 'yikachashu' has connotations of submission through deception or pretense. While 'cringe' captures the physical posture, 'submit themselves' might better convey the forced acknowledgment of superiority implied in the original.

[C] Or: "their heights" — While 'high places' accurately reflects the primary meaning of 'bamoteimo' in biblical Hebrew (often referring to elevated worship sites), in this context the more general 'heights' might better convey the metaphorical sense of triumph over the enemy's strongholds or points of pride.

[1] This opening verse establishes the prayer's focus on waiting or hoping for divine intervention. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's healing prayers, this represents the sick person's patient expectation of recovery or, if death approaches, divine redemption of the soul.

[2] The compilation of these verses in Ma'avar Yabok's healing prayer sequence transforms national salvation imagery into individual healing contexts. The collective experience of Israel becomes a template for the individual's hope for divine intervention in illness.

[3] This collection of prophetic verses begins with purification imagery that would be particularly relevant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok's focus on healing and preparation for death. The progression from purification to restoration reflects the spiritual journey intended for the sick person.

[i] Cf. Genesis 49:18 — This verse's placement at the beginning of this healing prayer collection is significant as it connects the sick person's hope for recovery to Jacob, who is the central figure in the Ma'avar Yabok metaphor (crossing the Yabok River) | Cf. Deuteronomy 10:20-21 — These verses establish the theological foundation for seeking divine healing—the same God who performed awesome deeds in Israel's history is the one being petitioned for healing | Cf. Deuteronomy 23:5 — This verse serves as a powerful example of divine transformation of negative to positive, which would give hope to the ill person that their condition could similarly be transformed from curse to blessing | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:3 — This verse frames the prayer as a proclamation of divine power and greatness, a theme in Ma'avar Yabok that proper prayer involves recognizing God's sovereignty | Cf. Deuteronomy 33:29 — This verse casts illness as an enemy that will ultimately submit to divine power, with the sick person eventually 'treading upon' their affliction just as Israel would triumph over enemies

[A] Or: "His appearance is as established as the dawn" — The Hebrew 'nachon' can mean 'certain,' but also 'established' or 'fixed.' This alternate translation emphasizes the reliability and predictability of divine revelation, similar to how the dawn always appears at its appointed time.

[B] Or: "and send down his roots like Lebanon" — The verb 'yach' (from 'nakah') can mean 'strike,' but in this botanical context, it more likely refers to the action of roots growing downward with force. The Lebanon mountains were known for their deeply-rooted cedar trees, so this translation better captures the image of deep, strong root development.

[C] Or: "You shall surely eat and be satisfied" — The repetition of the verb 'eat' (אָכוֹל) after 'you shall eat' (וְאֲכַלְתֶּם) is a Hebrew idiom indicating certainty rather than literal repetition of the action. This translation better conveys the emphatic nature of the promise in English.

[D] Or: "I will endure the LORD's wrath" — While 'indignation' is accurate, 'wrath' more directly conveys the emotional intensity of 'za'af' in modern English. The verb 'endure' also communicates the patient suffering implied in 'essa' (I will bear/carry) in a way that might resonate more clearly with contemporary readers.

[1] The text emphasizes that even during illness, one should continue practicing ethical virtues. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's integrated approach to healing that addresses both physical and spiritual dimensions.

[2] The verses from Hosea employ a series of botanical metaphors (dew, lily, Lebanon cedar, olive tree) that would be understood as representing the gradual but certain process of recovery through divine intervention—from initial moisture (dew) to full growth (Lebanon cedars) to fruitfulness (olive tree).

[3] This verse from Micah 4:5 affirms Jewish distinctiveness and faith commitment even amid suffering, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on maintaining proper spiritual orientation during illness.

[i] Cf. Ezekiel 36:25 — This verse from Ezekiel is used in the context of spiritual purification and healing. In Ma'avar Yabok, it's included as part of prayer sequences for the sick, suggesting that physical healing is connected to spiritual purification. | Cf. Hosea 6:3 — This verse emphasizes the reliability of God's presence like the dawn and rain, providing comfort to the sick with the

[A] Or: "Why do You hide Your face, and forget our suffering and our distress" — The Hebrew terms 'עָנְיֵנוּ' and 'לַחֲצֵנוּ' can be rendered with slightly different nuances. This alternative uses 'suffering' and 'distress' which may better convey the emotional experience being described in a more accessible modern English.

[B] Or: "For our soul is prostrated to the dust; our body clings to the ground" — The Hebrew 'בִּטְנֵנוּ' literally means 'our belly' but in this context refers to the physical body in a prostrate position. This alternative translation avoids the somewhat archaic 'cleaves' and provides a clearer image of complete prostration in modern English.

[1] The final verses move from acceptance of suffering as deserved (acknowledging sin) to confident expectation of divine vindication and restoration. This spiritual progression models the ideal attitude toward illness in Jewish tradition: humble acceptance followed by hopeful anticipation.

[2] The collection concludes with an expression of quiet confidence that prayer will be heard, providing reassurance to the ill person that their supplications are reaching God despite their current distress.

[3] Selah is a Hebrew musical or liturgical term found in the Psalms whose exact meaning is uncertain. It may indicate a musical interlude, a pause for reflection, or a shift in musical emphasis. In the context of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, it might serve as a moment of contemplative pause.

assurance that God will come to them reliably in their time of need. | Cf. Hosea 12:5-6 — These verses emphasize God's constancy and the need for the ill person to maintain proper spiritual attributes (kindness and justice) while waiting for divine healing. | Cf. Hosea 14:5-7 — These botanical metaphors for healing and restoration (dew, lily, Lebanon cedar, olive tree) would be understood as representing the gradual but certain process of recovery from illness through divine intervention. | Cf. Joel 2:26 — This verse connects physical restoration (eating and being satisfied) with spiritual response (praising God), suggesting that the sick person should anticipate both physical healing and spiritual renewal. | Cf. Jonah 2:9 — This verse from Jonah's prayer of thanksgiving while still in distress models how the ill person should express gratitude and fulfill vows even before complete healing occurs. | Cf. Micah 4:5 — This verse affirms Jewish distinctiveness and commitment to the true God even in times of suffering, encouraging the ill person to maintain faith in the one true God during their ordeal. | Cf. Micah 5:9 — In the context of illness, this verse would be understood as a prayer for God to raise His hand against the 'enemies' of disease and suffering afflicting the sick person. | Cf. Micah 7:9 — This verse models proper spiritual response to suffering: acknowledging sin, accepting divine discipline, and maintaining hope for eventual redemption and renewal. | Cf. Micah 7:7 — The concluding verse emphasizes hopeful watching and waiting for divine intervention, providing a model of patient endurance for the ill person who must wait for healing.

[1] This formulaic language draws from Daniel 9 and appears frequently in Jewish liturgy. In Ma'avar Yabok, invoking God's covenant relationship serves as a basis for requesting healing based on God's established promises rather than personal merit.

[2] While originally referring to the destroyed Temple in Jerusalem in Daniel's prayer, in Ma'avar Yabok's context this may be understood metaphorically to refer to the sick person's body as a desecrated sanctuary that needs divine restoration.

[3] The text shifts between individual ("I") and communal ("we") perspectives. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's understanding that illness affects both the individual and the community, and that healing requires both personal and communal prayer.

[i] Cf. Psalm 44:23-26 — This passage is used in Ma'avar Yabok as a prayer for the sick, with the prostration imagery symbolizing the physical weakness of illness. The text connects physical suffering to spiritual distress, implying that divine awakening will bring healing. | Cf. Psalm 46:1 — In the context of prayers for the sick, this verse serves to strengthen the ill person's faith that God remains their refuge even in severe illness. The phrase 'found most readily' (נִמְצָא מְאֹד) suggests that divine help is particularly accessible during times of distress. | Cf. Psalm 32:5 — This confession verse reflects Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on vidui (confession) for the sick. The book presents illness as potentially resulting from sin, and confession as a necessary spiritual remedy that may lead to physical healing as well. | Cf. Daniel 9:4-19 — Daniel's prayer is adapted here for individual use in times of illness. Ma'avar Yabok frequently draws on biblical models of confession and supplication, with Daniel's prayer being particularly significant as it combines personal and communal elements with references to covenant relationship. | Cf. Psalm 84:10-11 — The threefold repetition of 'restore us' with increasingly elaborate divine titles (God, God of hosts, LORD God of hosts) creates an intensification typical in Jewish prayer. In Ma'avar Yabok, this serves to emphasize the desperate need for divine healing through increasingly powerful appeals. | Cf. Psalm

[A] Or: "When my troubling thoughts multiply within me, Your consolations bring joy to my soul" — The Hebrew 'שַׁרְעַפַּי' refers to disquieting or anxious thoughts, and 'יְשַׁעְשְׁעוּ' carries connotations of both delight and comfort. This alternative rendering captures the contrast between internal anxiety and divine consolation more vividly.

[B] Or: "And one should recite "That Your beloved ones may be delivered..." and "Heal me, O LORD..." following the complete liturgical sequence specified above, until the concluding words "my Rock and my Redeemer."" — This alternate translation uses "one should recite" instead of "he shall say" to emphasize the instructional nature of the text, and specifies "complete liturgical sequence" rather than "entire order" to better convey the specialized religious context of these standardized prayer instructions.

[C] Or: "One should begin with "Please, O LORD, save us" and so forth" — This alternative provides a more impersonal instruction that might better reflect the liturgical manual format, using 'one should' rather than 'he shall.' This could be preferred in contexts where gender-neutral language is desired.

[1] This cross-reference demonstrates the practical manual nature of Ma'avar Yabok. Rather than 52:8 — The green olive tree image represents vitality and endurance, contrasting with the illness context. In Ma'avar Yabok, this serves as a meditation on the hope of restoration to health and continued spiritual flourishing despite current affliction.

[i] This refers to a standard prayer formula that appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences. The abbreviation "'וגו" (etc.) indicates that the reader should recite the complete, familiar prayer without needing it to be written out in full.

[ii] This is a healing prayer formula beginning with "Heal me, O LORD" (from Jeremiah 17:14), which was to be recited in its entirety. The abbreviation indicates that the full, familiar text should be recited.

[iii] This is a liturgical instruction directing the reader to follow the complete prayer sequence that was detailed earlier in the text, reciting everything through the concluding formula "my Rock and my Redeemer" (from Psalm 19:14).

[iv] Cf. Psalm 19:14 — This reference to Psalm 19:14 serves as a standardized closing formula for prayer sequences in Ma'avar Yabok. By referring to God as both Rock (stability/protection) and Redeemer (salvation/deliverance), it provides a fitting conclusion to prayers for the sick, reinforcing trust in divine protection during illness. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This abbreviated reference to Jeremiah 17:14 is used as a healing formula in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences. The verse expresses complete dependence on God for healing and salvation, reinforcing the book's theological framework that true healing comes from divine intervention rather than merely human efforts. | Cf. Psalm 108:7 — This reference to Psalm 108:7 serves as a standard opening formula in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences. By beginning with this verse, which asks for divine deliverance of God's beloved ones, the prayer immediately establishes its purpose of seeking divine intervention for the ill person while positioning them among God's beloved.

[v] This heading indicates the beginning of the eighth and final liturgical sequence in Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer system for the sick and dying. Each 'seder' (order) follows a similar pattern but contains different psalms and verses appropriate for various situations.

[vi] The abbreviation 'וגו" (etc.) appears multiple times in this passage. It indicates that the reader should continue with the complete text of a familiar prayer or passage without the author needing to write it out in full. This was a common space-saving technique in prayer books and liturgical manuals.

[A] Or: "followed by reciting "There is none like God" and what follows" — This alternative formulation avoids the repetition of 'he shall say' and provides a smoother liturgical instruction in English, which might be preferred in a more flowing translation.

repeating the full prayer text in each section, the author directs readers to where it first appears, creating an efficient reference system for those attending to the sick and dying.

[1] These psalms were selected for their themes of divine healing, protection, deliverance from death, and thanksgiving. Offering options reflects Ma'avar Yabok's approach of providing structured yet flexible prayer sequences that could be adapted to various situations of illness.

[2] The Hebrew 'mi-shaḥat' literally means 'from the pit' or 'from corruption,' which has dual significance in Ma'avar Yabok: it refers both to rescue from physical death and to redemption of the soul from spiritual destruction.

[i] This refers to instructions already provided in the first prayer order (seder). Ma'avar Yabok contains eight distinct prayer sequences (sedarim) for the sick and dying, each with standardized elements. Rather than repeating instructions, the text often refers back to where they first appeared.

[ii] These abbreviations refer to Psalms 103, 104, 116, or 118. Using numerical abbreviations for psalm references was common in traditional Jewish texts.

[iii] Cf. הושיעה נא אנא ה — This phrase is from Psalm 118:25 and serves as the standardized opening formula for each of the eight prayer sequences (sedarim) in Ma'avar Yabok. The instruction to begin with this formula indicates that this passage is establishing the structure for one of these formal prayer sequences for the sick or dying. | Cf. ככתוב למעלה בסדר א — This indicates that Ma'avar Yabok uses a system of standardized prayer sequences with consistent elements. Rather than repeating the full opening formula, the text refers readers back to the first sequence where it was fully detailed. This cross-referencing system appears throughout the book as a practical feature to avoid unnecessary repetition. | Cf. אין כאל — This phrase "There is none like God" comes from Deuteronomy 33:26 ("There is none like the God of Jeshurun") and became the opening of a standard prayer used in Jewish liturgy. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it appears to function as a standardized component of the prayer sequences for the sick and dying, creating a consistent framework while allowing flexibility in psalm selection.

[iv] The psalm begins with the reflexive command for the soul to bless God, establishing an internal dialogue that was considered spiritually beneficial for the sick. The repetition of this phrase both opens and closes the psalm, creating a liturgical frame.

[v] The term 'keravai' (my inward parts) refers to the internal organs, which in ancient Jewish thought were associated with emotions and spiritual faculties. In the context of illness, this becomes a call for even the afflicted body parts to participate in praising God.

[vi] This reference to God as healer of all diseases is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok, as it provides biblical foundation for the book's emphasis on both spiritual and physical healing. The medieval Jewish understanding saw illness as potentially serving both punitive and purificatory functions.

[vii] The metaphor of renewal 'like the eagle' draws on ancient belief that eagles periodically renewed their youth by molting and growing new feathers. In kabbalistic interpretation, this represents both physical healing and spiritual resurrection.

oppressed. He made known His ways to Moses, His deeds to the children of Israel. The LORD is compassionate and gracious, slow to anger and abundant in kindness. He will not contend forever,[1] nor will He harbor resentment eternally. He has not dealt with us according to our sins, nor repaid us according to our iniquities. For as high as the heavens are above the earth, so great is His kindness toward those who fear Him. As far as the east is from the west, so far has He removed our transgressions from us. As a father has compassion on his children, so the LORD has compassion on those who fear Him. For He knows our nature; He remembers that we are dust. [1] The Hebrew verb 'yariv' (contend/strive) carries juridical connotations, suggesting God as judge. This aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework that presents illness as divine judgment that is ultimately limited by divine mercy.

[2] The Hebrew 'gibborei koaḥ' (mighty in strength) refers to the angels, who in Jewish mystical tradition were understood as the agents carrying out divine will, including healing. Ma'avar Yabok includes extensive discussions of angelic intervention in healing and in guiding souls after death.

[i] Cf. Psalm 103 — This psalm is included in Ma'avar Yabok as part of the structured prayer sequences for healing the sick and comforting the dying. It appears in the sixth liturgical order (Seder Vav) and emphasizes divine forgiveness, healing, compassion, and the transient nature of human life—all themes particularly relevant to those facing serious illness or approaching death. | Cf. Psalm 103:3-5 — These verses are especially significant in Ma'avar Yabok's context as they directly address healing, redemption from death, and renewal—central concerns for the sick and dying. The imagery of renewal 'like the eagle' would be understood as representing the hope for both physical healing and spiritual resurrection. | Cf. Psalm 103:14-16 — These verses on human mortality and fragility serve as a meditation on the transient nature of life, which would be particularly poignant for those facing death. In Ma'avar Yabok, such reflections are not meant to induce despair but rather to encourage proper spiritual preparation and acceptance of divine judgment.

[1] This image of God cloaked in light is significant in kabbalistic thought, where divine light (or) represents God's emanation into the world. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse suggests the divine healing light that might surround the ill person.

[2] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse about the daily rhythm of human life takes on poignant meaning, as it reflects on the regular patterns that illness disrupts and that the dying person will soon leave behind.

[i] The phrase literally means "to make faces shine from oil" and refers to the ancient practice of anointing with oil, which made the face gleam. This is presented as one of the divine gifts that brings joy to humanity.

(Psalm 116) I love that the LORD hears my voice, my supplications. Because He has inclined His ear to me, I will call upon Him all my days. The cords of death entangled me, the straits of the grave found me; I encountered distress and sorrow. Then I called upon the name of the LORD: "O LORD, I implore You, deliver my soul!" Gracious is the LORD and righteous, and our God is merciful. The LORD

[1] This verse directly addresses mortality as part of divine design, acknowledging that death is part of God's ordained natural order. In Ma'avar Yabok, this recognition would help the dying person accept their situation as part of the cosmic plan.

[2] The Hebrew word 'ruach' means both 'spirit' and 'breath,' creating a powerful connection between divine breath giving life at creation and the breath of life that is ebbing in the sick person. This verse suggests the possibility of renewal even after death.

[i] There is ambiguity in the Hebrew about whether God created Leviathan to play in the sea, or whether God created Leviathan to play with. In kabbalistic texts, Leviathan has significant mystical meaning as a primordial creature.

[ii] This verse about renewal of the earth through divine spirit (ruach) would have particular resonance in Ma'avar Yabok's context of illness and death, as it suggests the possibility of revival and restoration through divine intervention.

[iii] Cf. Zohar — In Ma'avar Yabok, Psalm 104 serves as a meditation on divine creation and order, reinforcing how the same God who maintains the cosmos can also restore health to the ill person or guide the soul in its transition after death. | Cf. Genesis creation narrative — This psalm recounts God's orderly creation and maintenance of the world, providing reassurance to the sick or dying that the same God who created and sustains the universe also oversees human life and death with purpose and wisdom. | Cf. Shabbat liturgy — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok connects the sick person's experience to the larger cosmic and liturgical cycles, suggesting that illness and healing are part of the divine order that governs all creation.

[iv] The Hebrew term 'chevlei mavet' (cords of death) is a vivid metaphor depicting death as something that binds or entangles a person. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would be interpreted as referring to the physical and spiritual bonds that restrict the soul during serious illness.

[A] Or: "The LORD protects the innocent; I was weakened, and He saved me" — The term 'petayim' (פְּתָאִים) can refer to the 'simple' but also carries connotations of innocence or naivety. 'Daloti' (דַּלּוֹתִי) literally means 'I was impoverished/weakened.' This alternative emphasizes the vulnerable state of illness that would be particularly relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of prayers for the sick.

[B] Or: "I said in my haste, "All humanity is unreliable"" — The term 'b'chofzi' (בְּחָפְזִי) refers to a state of panic, haste or alarm, while 'kozev' (כֹּזֵב) can mean 'deceitful,' 'false,' or more broadly 'unreliable.' This alternate translation emphasizes the psalmist's momentary loss of faith in human reliability when facing mortality, which connects to Ma'avar Yabok's theme of finding divine rather than human support in times of crisis.

[C] Or: "Costly in the LORD's sight is the death of His devoted ones" — The Hebrew 'yakar' can mean both 'precious' (valued) and 'costly/dear' (representing a significant loss). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, both meanings enrich the interpretation—death is both valued by God as a sacred transition and recognized as a significant event requiring proper ritual attention.

[1] The phrase 'in the lands of the living' (בְּאַרְצוֹת הַחַיִּים) would have special resonance in Ma'avar Yabok's context. It suggests both continued life in this world after recovery from illness and also the afterlife in the World to Come (Olam Haba), reflecting the book's dual concern with both healing the sick and preparing the soul for its journey after death.

[2] The 'cup of salvation' (כּוֹס־יְשׁוּעוֹת) serves as a powerful ritual metaphor. In liturgical contexts, it represents the third cup of wine at the Passover Seder, while in Ma'avar Yabok's framework, it would symbolize how proper ritual actions serve as vehicles for divine deliverance from illness or a peaceful transition in death.

[3] The fulfillment of vows (נְדָרַי) has special significance in the context of illness, as it was common practice to make vows during sickness promising charitable or religious acts in exchange for recovery. Ma'avar Yabok emphasizes the importance of fulfilling such vows, as mentioned in the memory notes on the annulment of vows for the sick.

[i] This phrase reflects a moment of existential crisis where the psalmist, facing mortality, expresses a loss of faith in human reliability. The Hebrew 'b'chofzi' conveys a state of alarm or panicked haste, while the declaration about all humanity being 'kozev' (deceitful/unreliable) represents the profound spiritual disorientation that can accompany serious illness.

[ii] This verse is particularly significant in the context of Jewish approaches to death, offering theological comfort by suggesting that the death of the righteous is not a tragedy but rather something valued in God's eyes. The Hebrew term 'yakar' carries connotations of both 'precious' and 'costly,' creating a rich ambiguity that acknowledges both the value and the gravity of death.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — Psalm 116 appears in the liturgical sequences of Ma'avar Yabok as one of the LORD now in the presence of all His people, in the courts of the LORD's house, in your midst, O Jerusalem. Hallelujah! 1745R

(Psalm 118) Give thanks to the LORD, for He is good, for His loving-kindness endures forever. Let Israel now say: "His loving-kindness endures forever." Let the house of Aaron now say: "His loving-kindness endures forever." Let those who fear the LORD now say: "His loving-kindness endures forever." From distress I called upon the LORD; the LORD answered me with expansiveness.[1] The LORD is for me; I will not fear. What can man do to me? The LORD is for me, among my helpers; therefore I will look upon those who hate me. It is better to take refuge in the LORD than to trust in man. It is better to take refuge in the LORD than to trust in nobles. All nations surrounded me; in the name of the LORD I will cut them off. They surrounded me, yes, they surrounded me; in the name of the LORD I will cut them off. They surrounded me like bees; they were extinguished like a fire of thorns;[2] in the name of the LORD I will cut them off. You pushed me hard that I might fall, but the LORD helped me. The LORD is my strength and song, and He has become my salvation. The voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tents of the righteous; the right hand of the LORD does valiantly. The right hand of the LORD is exalted; the right hand of the LORD does valiantly. 1750R 1755R 1760R 1765R 1770R

[1] The Hebrew creates a powerful contrast between 'מִן־הַמֵּצַר' (from the narrow place/confinement) and 'בַּמֶּרְחָב' (in the broad place/expansiveness), suggesting not just rescue but transformation from constriction to freedom.

[2] The simile of bees suggests not just encirclement but painful, threatening attack from multiple directions. The image of being quickly extinguished like burning thorns (which flare up but quickly burn out) suggests the transitory nature of the threat despite its initial intensity.

the recommended psalms for recitation by or for the sick. Its themes of divine deliverance from death, thanksgiving for salvation, and commitment to fulfill vows make it particularly appropriate for healing prayers and for those facing mortality. | Cf. Traditional Jewish Liturgy — Psalm 116 is part of the Hallel prayer sequence recited on festivals and special occasions. Its inclusion in Ma'avar Yabok shows how the author repurposes familiar liturgical elements for the specific context of illness and approaching death. | Cf. Zohar — The psalm's references to 'cords of death' (חֶבְלֵי־מָוֶת) and 'straits of the grave' (מְצָרֵי שְׁאוֹל) would be interpreted kabbalistically in Ma'avar Yabok as referring to the soul's journey and the dangers it faces during the transition from life to death, which aligns with the book's central metaphor of 'crossing the Yabok.' | Cf. Talmud — The Talmud connects the phrase 'cup of salvation' (כּוֹס־יְשׁוּעוֹת) to the third cup of wine at the Passover Seder. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this would symbolize how proper ritual action serves as a vehicle for divine deliverance, particularly at critical life transitions. | Cf. Traditional Jewish Death Rituals — The phrase 'Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of His faithful ones' (יָקָר בְּעֵינֵי יְיָ הַמָּוְתָה לַחֲסִידָיו) is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok's context, as it provides theological comfort that death, when properly approached through religious ritual, is not a tragedy but a valued transition in divine eyes.

the great, mighty, and awesome God, who shows no partiality and accepts no bribes. For you are a holy people to the LORD your God, and the LORD has chosen you to be His treasured people from all the nations on the face of the earth. And to set you high 1800R

[1] This verse has been interpreted in various ways, either as instructions for binding festival sacrifices to the altar with cords, or as a procession of celebrants with branches or palm fronds approaching the altar. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, such Temple imagery would be spiritualized as the soul's approach to divine realms.

[2] This dramatic image of God as a divine warrior riding through the heavens to bring help would be particularly comforting to someone facing illness or approaching death, as it portrays God actively intervening on behalf of the suffering individual.

[i] Cf. Psalms — Psalm 118 is included in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequence as a powerful expression of trust in divine salvation despite surrounding dangers. Its themes of divine deliverance, thanksgiving, and the temporary nature of suffering make it particularly appropriate for those experiencing serious illness or facing death. The psalm's declarations of confidence that 'I shall not die but live' would have special resonance in this context. | Cf. Temple worship — The psalm's references to Temple worship (gates of righteousness, festival sacrifices, altar) would be interpreted in Ma'avar Yabok's context as symbolic of the soul's approach to divine realms, particularly relevant as the sick person contemplates potential transition to the afterlife. These Temple motifs are consistently reinterpreted throughout the book as spiritual journeys rather than physical rituals. | Cf. Hallel prayer sequence — Within Ma'avar Yabok, the inclusion of this psalm from the Hallel sequence connects individual suffering to communal celebration, suggesting that even in illness, the individual remains part of the broader covenant community. This reflects the book's consistent integration of individual spiritual experience with communal religious practice.

The LORD God is my strength, and He makes my feet like hinds' feet, and He leads me upon my high places, for the Chief Musician on my stringed instruments. The LORD

[A] Or: "and he was humbled before My name" — The Hebrew verb נָחַת (nichat) can indicate being subdued, humbled, or brought low. While 'reverent' captures the spiritual attitude, 'humbled' more directly reflects the literal meaning of being lowered or brought down in awe.

[1] This acknowledgment of divine mystery would be especially relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context, as it provides a theological framework for accepting the unknown aspects of illness, suffering, and death while focusing on what has been revealed through Torah.

[2] This opening verse from Malachi 2:5 refers to God's covenant with the priestly tribe of Levi, though in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it takes on additional significance regarding the covenant between God and those who properly prepare for death.

[i] Cf. Deuteronomy 33:26-27 — This verse describes God as the protector of Israel (Jeshurun), riding through the heavens to help His people. In Ma'avar Yabok, this powerful image of divine protection would provide comfort to the sick or dying person. | Cf. Deuteronomy 10:17 — This verse emphasizes God's supreme authority and perfect justice, reminding the sick person that God is ultimately fair and trustworthy even in times of suffering. | Cf. Deuteronomy 7:6 — This verse reminds the sick person of their spiritual identity as part of God's chosen people, providing comfort through belonging to a covenantal relationship with God. | Cf. Deuteronomy 26:18-19 — This verse provides reassurance about Israel's special status and divine purpose, which would be particularly comforting to someone facing illness or death. | Cf. Deuteronomy 29:29 — This verse acknowledges the limits of human understanding while emphasizing that following God's revealed commandments is what matters. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this would help the sick person accept the mysteries of suffering while focusing on faithfulness to God's revealed will. | Cf. Zohar — In Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework, these verses would be understood as invoking divine protection through their recitation, with each divine attribute mentioned (great, mighty, awesome) corresponding to specific sefirot or divine emanations that could provide spiritual healing.

[ii] The verb נָחַת (nichat) indicates being subdued or humbled, conveying reverential awe rather than simple fear.

[iii] This imagery of feet like hinds' feet (female deer) represents sure-footedness in difficult terrain, a metaphor for divine assistance in overcoming obstacles.

[iv] This phrase echoes the superscriptions of many psalms, suggesting this collection of prophetic verses was intended for musical performance.

has removed your judgments;[1] He has cleared away your enemy. The King of Israel, the LORD, is in your midst; you will fear disaster no more. The LORD your God is in your midst, a mighty one who will save; He will rejoice over you with gladness; He will quiet you with His love;[A] He will exult over you with loud singing. Then the offering of Judah and Jerusalem will be pleasing to the LORD as in the days of old and as in former years. But for you who fear My name, the sun of righteousness shall rise with healing in its wings,[2] and you shall go forth and grow fat like calves from the stall.[B] The LORD is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble, and He knows those who take refuge in Him. O LORD, I have heard the report of You, and I fear; O LORD, revive Your work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make it known; in wrath remember mercy.[3] And I will betroth you to Me forever;[4] I will betroth you to Me in righteousness and in justice, in steadfast love and in mercy. And

[A] Or: "He will be silent in His love" — The verb יַחֲרִישׁ (yacharish) literally means 'he will be silent/quiet.' The current translation interprets this as God quieting the person, but it could also mean God Himself being silent in contemplative love, which creates a more striking contrast with the exultation that follows.

[B] Or: "and you shall go forth and frisk about like calves from the stall" — The Hebrew וּפִשְׁתֶּם (u'fishtem) can indicate either growing fat (prosperity) or frisking/gamboling (joyful movement). In the context of healing and release, the image of playful, energetic movement might be more appropriate than simply growing fat.

[1] This and the following verses from Zephaniah 3:15-17 speak of divine consolation after punishment, which in Ma'avar Yabok's context would provide comfort to the sick or dying by assuring them that divine judgment will ultimately give way to mercy.

[2] This beautiful image from Malachi 4:2 of divine healing through the metaphor of sunrise would be particularly powerful in Ma'avar Yabok's context of illness and approaching death, offering hope of spiritual healing even when physical recovery might not be possible.

[3] This verse from Habakkuk 3:2 captures a central theological theme throughout Ma'avar Yabok: the hope that divine mercy will temper judgment, particularly relevant for those facing illness or death who might fear divine punishment.

[4] These verses from Hosea 2:19-20 use marriage imagery to describe God's relationship with Israel. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this metaphor extends to the individual soul's eternal bond with God that transcends death.

[i] The verb יַחֲרִישׁ (yacharish) literally means "He will be silent/quiet," creating a beautiful contrast with the exultation and singing that follows—divine love expressed through both peaceful silence and joyful noise.

[ii] The Hebrew וּפִשְׁתֶּם (u'fishtem) comes from the root פוּשׁ meaning "to grow fat" or "to spring about," conveying both prosperity and joyful vigor like well-fed calves.

[iii] This poignant juxtaposition of divine wrath (רֹגֶז/rogez) and mercy (רַחֵם/rachem) is characteristic of prophetic literature, expressing the tension between judgment and compassion in God's relationship with Israel.

[iv] Cf. Malachi 2:5-7 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse about God's covenant of life and peace with the priesthood takes on new significance in the context of death rituals, suggesting that proper spiritual service creates a covenant relationship that extends beyond death. | Cf. Habakkuk 3:19 — This verse about God making one's feet like hinds' feet (sure-footed even in difficult terrain) serves

I will make with them a covenant of peace, an everlasting covenant; it shall be with them, and I will give to them and multiply them, and I will set My sanctuary in their midst forever.[1] 1840R

This is my comfort in my affliction, for Your word 1845R 1850R 1855R 1860R

[A] Or: "So that Your cherished ones may be rescued" — The Hebrew term 'yedidecha' carries connotations of deep affection beyond mere 'beloved,' while 'yechaltzun' can also convey the sense of being drawn out of danger. This alternative captures a slightly different emotional tone while preserving the meaning.

[1] This concluding verse from Ezekiel 37:26-27 refers to the restoration of Israel and the eternal presence of God's sanctuary. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it offers the ultimate consolation that beyond death lies eternal dwelling in God's presence.

[2] This prayer compilation opens with an expression of desperate calling to God, setting the tone for a supplication made in distress.

[3] Despite the prayer's context of suffering, it includes expressions of praise and blessing, balancing supplication with affirmation of God's worthiness of praise.

as a powerful metaphor for divine support during the challenging spiritual journey of illness and approaching death. | Cf. Malachi 4:2 — The imagery of the 'sun of righteousness' with 'healing in its wings' provides a powerful meditation for the sick and dying on divine healing that may transcend physical recovery to encompass spiritual restoration. | Cf. Psalm superscriptions — This phrase echoes the superscriptions of many psalms, suggesting this collection of prophetic verses was intended for musical performance, connecting these prophetic texts to liturgical practice similar to the psalms used elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok.

[i] This opening verse is from Psalm 77:2, beginning a collection of biblical verses arranged as a prayer seeking divine help in times of distress.

[ii] From Psalm 106:4, this verse is part of a prayer requesting to be included in God's salvation of His people.

[iii] From Psalm 60:7, this phrase appears as a standard opening formula for the concluding section of each prayer sequence in Ma'avar Yabok.

[iv] From Psalm 115:9-13, this section contains several consecutive verses that emphasize trust in God as a shield and source of blessing.

[v] This verse and the following three verses are from Psalm 119 (verses 76, 50, 116, and 122), forming a sequence focused on divine comfort and support in affliction.

[A] Or: "Pledge Yourself as surety for Your servant's welfare" — The term 'arov' involves the concept of pledging or exchanging as a guarantee, similar to a financial transaction. This alternative emphasizes the covenantal aspect of God acting as a guarantor for the petitioner.

[1] The prayer highlights the therapeutic value of divine scripture itself as a source of comfort during suffering, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on reciting sacred texts during illness.
[2] This metaphor of God raising the fallen would be particularly meaningful in the context of illness, where the sick person is often physically bent or bedridden.
[3] The prayer concludes its petitionary section with an affirmation of God as healer, both of physical and emotional suffering, before transitioning to the final doxology.
[4] This is the beginning of a standard prayer formula that appears throughout Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequences. The 'etc.' (וגו׳) indicates that the full prayer would be known to the user and didn't need to be written out completely.
[5] This phrase (צורי וגואלי) marks the standard conclusion of the prayer sequences in Ma'avar Yabok, creating a consistent liturgical framework.

[i] From Psalm 119:149-150, continuing the theme of seeking divine attention and revival.
[ii] From Psalm 145:14-15, describing God as one who raises the fallen and straightens those who are bent down, a metaphor particularly relevant for the sick.
[iii] From Psalm 146:8, describing God's power to heal various afflictions, a theme of particular relevance in the context of prayers for the sick.
[iv] From Psalm 147:3, emphasizing God's role as a healer, particularly of emotional and spiritual wounds.
[v] From 1 Chronicles 16:36, a standard doxology (praise formula) that serves as a conclusion to this prayer compilation.
[vi] Cf. Psalm 77 — This opening verse sets the tone of crying out to God in distress, appropriate for someone experiencing serious illness or approaching death. | Cf. Psalm 119 — These verses are selected for their emphasis on divine comfort, sustenance, and revival through God's word, offering solace to the ill person through scriptural promises. | Cf. Psalm 145-147 — These verses emphasize God's role as healer and supporter of the weak, providing reassurance to the sick person that God specializes in helping those in physical distress. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's prayer structure — This compilation follows the therapeutic pattern seen throughout Ma'avar Yabok: beginning with cries of distress, moving through petitions for help, and concluding with affirmations of God's healing power and praises of His name.

[A] Or: "A Pilgrim Song" — This translation captures the practical function of these psalms as songs sung by pilgrims traveling to Jerusalem for festivals, making their purpose more immediately clear to modern readers unfamiliar with Temple practices.

[B] Or: "When you enjoy the fruit of your labor" — This translation preserves the meaning while using more natural English phrasing. The Hebrew uses the metaphor of 'eating' one's labor to represent enjoying the benefits of one's work.

[C] Or: "in the inner chambers of your home" — This alternate translation more clearly conveys the spatial concept of the private, interior portions of the home where the wife would typically manage household affairs in ancient Near Eastern culture.

[1] The text confirms that Ma'avar Yabok's 'Seder' section contains eight distinct liturgical sequences for healing the sick and comforting the dying, each with a similar structure but offering different psalm options.

[2] This instruction reflects the text's balance between providing structured guidance and allowing for adaptation to individual circumstances. Rather than rigid prescription, Ma'avar Yabok offers a flexible framework that can be tailored based on the situation and the wisdom of those attending to the sick.

[3] The imagery of fertility and abundance (wife as vine, children as olive plants) creates a picture of domestic harmony and divine blessing. These agricultural metaphors would be particularly poignant for those concerned about their family's future wellbeing during serious illness.

[i] The text refers to 'these eight orders' (השמנה סדרים אלו), confirming that the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok contains eight distinct liturgical sequences for healing the sick and comforting the dying.

[ii] This phrase indicates flexibility in the prayer selection process, suggesting that while Ma'avar Yabok provides structured guidance, it allows for personal discretion based on individual circumstances.

[iii] The author explicitly states that these prayer recommendations are not fixed law (הלכות קבועות), distinguishing them from obligatory ritual requirements and emphasizing the discretionary nature of these prayers for the sick.

[iv] "Song of Ascents" refers to a collection of fifteen psalms (Psalms 120-134) that were likely sung by pilgrims as they ascended to Jerusalem for the three annual festivals, or by the Levites as they ascended the fifteen steps of the Temple. In Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm appears in a section of prayers recommended for recitation by or for the sick.

[v] This phrase emphasizes the value of honest labor and self-sufficiency. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would have special significance for the ill person who might be concerned about dependency or inability to support their family.

[vi] The comparison of a wife to a "fruitful vine" employs botanical imagery that continues with the children compared to "olive plants." In kabbalistic thought, these images relate to fertility, continuity, and divine blessing. The vine particularly symbolizes abundance and joy.

[vii] Olive plants represent vitality, longevity, and continuity, as olive trees are known for their long life and productivity. In the context of prayers for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, this imagery of thriving children would offer hope and comfort regarding family continuity even in the face of illness.

(Psalm 130) A Song of Ascents. Out of the depths I have called to You,[3] O LORD. Lord, hear my voice; let Your ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications. If You, LORD, should mark iniquities,[4] O Lord, who could stand? But with You there is forgiveness, that You may be feared. I wait for the LORD, my soul waits, and in His word I hope. My soul waits for the Lord more than those who watch

[A] Or: "And may you live to see your grandchildren" — While the original translation is literally accurate, this alternate more naturally expresses the intended blessing of longevity and family continuity in contemporary English, making the meaning immediately clear to modern readers.

[1] The mention of Zion (Jerusalem) connects personal blessing with the sacred center of Jewish religious life. In the context of prayers for healing, this links individual recovery with divine presence emanating from the holy city.

[2] The psalm's conclusion widens its focus from individual blessing to national welfare, reflecting the Jewish theological understanding that personal and communal wellbeing are interconnected. This aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on the relationship between individual spiritual health and communal responsibility.

[3] This psalm is one of the most profound expressions of penitence and hope in the Psalter, often recited in times of distress and as part of mourning rituals.

[4] The psalm moves from the personal to the universal here, suggesting that no one could withstand divine judgment if God were to account for all transgressions.

[i] This concluding blessing for peace over Israel extends the psalm's focus from individual blessing to communal welfare. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this connects the individual's healing with the well-being of the entire community, a theme consistent with the book's emphasis on communal responsibility in times of illness and death.

[ii] Cf. Psalm 127 — Psalm 128 continues the themes of its predecessor, expanding on the concept that children are a divine blessing. While Psalm 127 states that "children are a heritage from the LORD," Psalm 128 elaborates by depicting them as olive plants around the table, emphasizing both abundance and stability. | Cf. Proverbs 31:10-31 — The image of the wife as a "fruitful vine within the recesses of your house" echoes Proverbs 31's portrait of the industrious wife whose value is recognized within the domestic sphere. Both texts honor the woman's contribution to family prosperity while acknowledging the gendered division of space (women in the "inner" parts of the house) typical of ancient Near Eastern societies. | Cf. Psalm 134 — Both Psalm 128 and Psalm 134 conclude the Songs of Ascents with blessing formulas. Psalm 128's "May the LORD bless you from Zion" is echoed in Psalm 134's "May the LORD, maker of heaven and earth, bless you from Zion." This suggests a liturgical function for these blessings, possibly used by priests or Levites to bless pilgrims or worshippers. | Cf. Ezekiel 19:10 — The image of the wife as a "fruitful vine" echoes biblical metaphors where vines represent fertility and abundance. In Ezekiel, Israel is "like a vine in your bloodline, planted by the waters, fruitful and full of branches." This suggests that the domestic blessing in Psalm 128 mirrors the national blessing of Israel, connecting household prosperity with national flourishing.

[iii] The Hebrew 'ma'amakim' (depths) conveys both physical depth and emotional/spiritual profundity, suggesting a cry from the deepest part of one's being in a state of extreme distress.

[iv] The verb 'tishmor' (mark/keep) suggests the idea of God keeping a record or account of sins, like a creditor tracking debts.

[A] Or: "who serve in the house of the LORD during the night watches" — The Hebrew עֹמְדִים (standing) often carries the connotation of service or duty in religious contexts, and 'during the night watches' more clearly conveys the ongoing nature of the service being performed. This alternate translation might better capture the sense of dedicated vigilance that would resonate with Ma'avar Yabok's context of caring for the dying.

[1] This comparison to watchmen waiting for dawn would resonate deeply in ancient times when night brought heightened dangers and vulnerability, making morning an eagerly anticipated relief.
[2] The psalm concludes by expanding from individual to communal salvation, expressing confidence that divine redemption extends to the entire community of Israel.
[3] The Hebrew phrase שִׁיר הַמַּעֲלוֹת (Shir HaMa'alot) literally means "Song of the Steps/Ascents." It appears in 15 psalms (120-134), possibly referring to the 15 steps of the Temple, pilgrimages to Jerusalem, or a musical notation.
[4] The raising of hands (נְשִׂיאַת כַּפַּיִם) is a traditional prayer gesture in Judaism. Its inclusion in this psalm, which appears in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgy for the sick, suggests that those attending to the dying should pray with both physical gestures and spiritual intention.
[5] The psalm contains a beautiful symmetry: it begins with humans blessing God and concludes

[i] This repetition creates a powerful poetic emphasis, comparing the soul's longing for God to watchmen eagerly awaiting the dawn after a dangerous night watch.
[ii] Cf. Lamentations 3:55-57 — This connection reinforces that the 'depths' in Psalm 130 can refer to profound suffering or despair, similar to the pit imagery in Lamentations, while maintaining hope in divine response. | Cf. Jonah 2:2-3 — This parallel reinforces the understanding of 'depths' as a place of profound crisis where divine intervention is urgently needed, suggesting the psalm could be understood as a prayer from someone in an extremely desperate spiritual or physical situation. | Cf. Psalms 143:2 — Both texts express the theological understanding that human righteousness cannot withstand divine scrutiny, establishing the need for divine mercy rather than strict justice.
[iii] This is the title of Psalm 134, the last of fifteen psalms (120-134) bearing this designation. "Song of Ascents" may refer to pilgrimages to Jerusalem, steps of the Temple, or a style of musical performance.
[iv] This likely refers to the Levites who served night watches in the Temple. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this might be understood as referring to those who keep vigil with the sick or dying during nighttime hours.
[v] The raising of hands is a traditional Jewish prayer gesture. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this might symbolize the spiritual elevation sought for the soul of the sick or dying person.
[vi] This final verse shifts from addressing the servants to blessing them, creating a call-and-response structure. In Ma'avar Yabok, this may represent the reciprocal relationship between those performing sacred duties for the sick/dying and the divine blessing they receive in return.
[vii] Cf. Psalm 121:2 — By echoing the language of Psalm 121, this psalm connects care for the dying with divine protection. Just as God who "made heaven and earth" protects Israel in Psalm 121, here that same Creator blesses those who maintain sacred night vigils. | Cf. 1 Chronicles 9:33 — The psalm's reference to those "who stand in the house of the LORD at night" likely alludes to the Levites who maintained continual service in the Temple. In Ma'avar Yabok, this would resonate with the sacred duty of maintaining vigil with the dying, suggesting that this too is a holy service comparable to Temple worship. | Cf. לַמְנַצֵּחַ לְדָוִד (תהלים קלט)

(Psalm 139) For the conductor. A psalm of David.

[A] Or: "before the gods" — Some scholars interpret 'elohim' here as referring to pagan gods, with the psalmist declaring that he will praise the true God in defiance of false deities. This reading is grammatically possible but less likely in the theological context of the psalm.

[B] Or: "in the presence of rulers/judges" — The term 'elohim' is occasionally used in the Hebrew Bible to refer to human authorities or judges. This interpretation would suggest the psalmist is making a public declaration of praise before human authorities.

with God blessing humans. This reciprocity would be meaningful in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, suggesting that those who perform the sacred duty of attending to the dying will themselves receive divine blessing.

[1] The imagery of God's 'right hand' appears frequently in psalms as a symbol of divine power and intervention. In the context of this psalm about divine protection, it represents God's active saving power.

[2] The Hebrew יִגְמֹר בַּעֲדִי literally means 'will complete/perfect concerning me' and refers to God bringing to completion what He has started in the psalmist's life.

tradition extensively discussed the practice of raising hands in prayer, mentioned in this psalm. In Ma'avar Yabok, this would suggest that physical prayer gestures are important components of the liturgical care for the dying, combining bodily actions with spiritual intentions.

[i] The phrase can be translated as 'before the gods' or 'before the divine beings.' In the context of this psalm, it likely refers to either angelic beings or judges who were sometimes called 'elohim' in biblical Hebrew.

[ii] This phrase is difficult to translate precisely. It literally means 'for You have magnified above all Your name Your word.' It suggests that God places the fulfillment of His promises (His word) even above His reputation (His name).

[iii] This unusual Hebrew phrase literally means 'You made me proud/bold in my soul with strength.' It describes divine empowerment that creates inner courage or confidence.

[iv] Cf. Psalm 23:6 — Both texts express confidence in God's ongoing kindness (חֶסֶד) that persists throughout the psalmist's life. Psalm 138 expands this to an eternal timeframe ('לְעוֹלָם') while maintaining the personal relationship between the individual and the divine. | Cf. Isaiah 57:15 — Psalm 138:6 and Isaiah 57:15 share the theological concept that God, despite His exalted nature, pays special attention to the lowly/humble. This paradox of divine transcendence combined with immanent care for the vulnerable is a recurring theme in biblical literature.

[A] Or: "You discern my intentions from afar" — The term 'לְרֵעִי' has been variously translated, with some interpreting it as 'my thought' and others as 'my intention' or 'my purpose.' The alternate translation preserves the meaning while using terminology that might be clearer in context.

[B] Or: "You winnow my going out and my lying down" — The Hebrew verb 'זֵרִיתָ' (zerita) comes from the root meaning 'to winnow/sift/scatter.' The alternate uses 'winnow' which more directly connects to the agricultural metaphor in the original Hebrew while 'going out' for 'אָרְחִי' (orchi) provides a clearer parallel to 'lying down.'

[C] Or: "Your eyes beheld my embryo" — The Hebrew term 'גָּלְמִי' (golmi) refers specifically to an unformed or embryonic state. While 'unformed substance' captures the meaning, 'embryo' is more direct and precise in modern English, especially in a psalm discussing human formation.

[1] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse would take on special significance for those facing death, offering reassurance that divine presence continues even in Sheol (the realm of the dead). This theological point aligns with the book's purpose of providing spiritual comfort during the transition from life to death.

[2] The Hebrew phrase 'בְּתַחְתִּיּוֹת אָרֶץ' (in the depths of the earth) uses imagery that appears elsewhere in Scripture to refer to the realm of the dead. Here, however, it functions as a poetic metaphor for the hidden, mysterious process of embryonic development, comparing the womb to the earth's depths where things form unseen.

[i] In the original text, this word appears as 'פלאיה' with a correction to 'פְּלִיאָה'. This scribal correction demonstrates careful attention to the text's accuracy.

[ii] This poetic phrase employs the rhetorical device of using the same Hebrew root (חשך/darkness) in different forms, creating a wordplay that emphasizes how darkness itself cannot create darkness from God's perspective.

[iii] The Hebrew text shows a scribal correction from 'ולא' (and not) to 'וְלוֹ' (and to him/it). This textual variant significantly affects the meaning, changing from 'not one of them existed' to 'though not one of them yet existed.'

They sharpen their tongues like a serpent; the venom of asps is under their lips.[4] Selah. Keep me, O LORD, from the hands of the wicked; preserve me from violent

[A] Or: "days were predetermined when none of them yet existed" — This difficult phrase has been variously interpreted. The alternate translation better conveys the concept of divine foreknowledge of all the days of one's life before they come into being, which fits the psalm's theme of God's complete knowledge of the individual.

[B] Or: "from men of violence" — While 'violent men' is accurate, 'men of violence' more clearly indicates that violence is their defining characteristic rather than merely a temporary state.

[1] The Hebrew term 'רַעְיֶךָ' (re'echa) has been variously translated as 'thoughts,' 'companions,' or 'friends.' The translation follows the contextual meaning of God's thoughts concerning the psalmist, which fits the psalm's emphasis on divine knowledge.

[2] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this concluding request would take on additional significance as a prayer for divine guidance through the ultimate transition of death into eternal life, connecting to the book's central metaphor of 'crossing over.'

[3] The Hebrew expresses continuous action—they are constantly plotting evil, not just occasionally.

[4] This powerful metaphor equates malicious speech with deadly poison, suggesting that harmful words can be as destructive as venom.

[i] The Hebrew employs an emphatic construction 'perfect hatred I hate them' that intensifies the emotional force through repetition of the same root.

[ii] Cf. Genesis 2:7 — The psalm expands on Genesis by depicting not just the initial creation but God's intimate involvement in the formation of each individual in the womb, suggesting that each person's creation is as intentional as Adam's. | Cf. Job 10:8-12 — Both texts use embodied language to describe divine creation of human life, but while Job's account expresses bewilderment that God would create him only to destroy him, Psalm 139 presents this intimate knowledge as comforting rather than troubling. | Cf. Jeremiah 1:5 — Psalm 139 develops this concept of divine foreknowledge from an individual perspective, detailing how God's knowledge encompasses not just prophetic calling but every aspect of human existence from conception through death. | Cf. Zohar III:47b — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this connection to Zoharic teaching would remind the sick or dying person that their life span is divinely ordained, with each day having spiritual purpose, which offers comfort when contemplating mortality.

(תהלים קמא) מִזְמוֹר לְדָוִד[iii] יְיָ

(Psalm 141) A psalm of David. O LORD, I call upon

[A]Or: "overwhelm them" — The Hebrew verb 'yechaseimu' carries the sense of covering completely or overwhelming. While 'cover' is accurate, 'overwhelm' captures the intensity of the desired consequence for the wicked.

[B]Or: "into watery depths" — The Hebrew 'mahamorot' can refer specifically to watery pits or depths. While 'deep pits' is accurate, 'watery depths' captures a more specific aspect of the original term that carries connotations of drowning or overwhelming floods.

[C]Or: "into utter ruin" — The Hebrew 'lemadchefot' conveys the image of being pushed over precipices or into destruction. 'To overthrow him' captures the action but 'into utter ruin' better conveys the totality of the destruction intended in the psalm.

[1]This phrase combines military imagery with theological concepts of divine deliverance, portraying God as both the source and the power behind the psalmist's protection.

[2]The imagery of burning coals likely alludes to divine judgment, similar to other biblical passages where fire symbolizes God's purifying or punishing power.

[3]This statement shifts from personal petition to a broader theological affirmation about God's character as defender of the vulnerable, moving from the individual to the universal.

[i]The text contains Kethiv/Qere variants (written vs. read forms) indicated by the square brackets, showing corrections to the traditional text. This reflects the meticulous transmission process of biblical texts.

[ii]Cf. Psalm 58:4-5 — The psalmist draws on established imagery comparing dangerous speech to serpent venom. This connection suggests the author sees slanderous speech as not merely harmful but actively poisonous and potentially deadly. | Cf. Psalm 7:14-16 — Both psalms employ the principle of poetic justice where the weapons or traps of the wicked become instruments of their own destruction. This reflects the theological view that divine justice often works through allowing evildoers to be caught in their own devices. | Cf. Romans 3:13 — While this is a later reference (not contemporary with the psalm), it shows how this psalm became integrated into broader theological reflections on human wickedness, particularly focusing on harmful speech as a manifestation of sin. | Cf. Psalm 9:4 — This reflects a consistent theme in Davidic psalms: confidence that God acts as the defender of those who lack earthly power or protection. The poor and afflicted can rely on divine justice when human systems fail them.

[iii]This psalm is attributed to King David and appears in the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok as one of several psalms specifically recommended for recitation by or for the sick. This context explains why it appears in a manual focused on end-of-life care.

Set a guard, O LORD, over my mouth; keep watch over the door of my lips. Do not incline my heart to any evil thing, to practice wicked deeds with men who do iniquity; and let me not eat of their delicacies. 2000R 2005R 2010R 2015R

[A] Or: "Let the righteous one strike me with kindness" — The Hebrew phrase allows for interpreting 'chesed' (kindness) either as describing the nature of the striking itself or as an appositive explaining that the striking is an act of kindness. This alternate reading suggests the righteous person's correction is delivered with kindness rather than harshness.

[B] Or: "Their judges have been hurled down the sides of a cliff" — The challenging Hebrew phrase could refer to execution by throwing from heights, which was an ancient punishment. This alternate translation makes the violent image more explicit, which may better convey the psalm's contrast between the fate of the wicked and the psalmist's hope for divine protection.

[1] The Hebrew compares prayer to 'ketoret' (קְטֹרֶת), the special incense blend offered in the ancient Temple. This verse establishes a crucial concept in Jewish mystical thought that proper prayer serves as a spiritual substitute for Temple offerings.

[2] The Hebrew 'shemen rosh' (שֶׁמֶן רֹאשׁ) literally means 'oil of the head' or 'finest oil.' This creates a metaphor where righteous criticism is compared to the anointing oil used for kings and priests—something precious and sanctifying rather than merely painful.

[3] Sheol (שְׁאוֹל) is the biblical term for the underworld or grave. This vivid imagery of scattered bones at death's entrance creates a stark contrast with the psalm's conclusion of divine protection, which would be particularly meaningful in a text focused on end-of-life care.

[4] The Hebrew 'al-t'ar nafshi' (אַל־תְּעַר נַפְשִׁי) literally means 'do not pour out my soul,' a metaphor for making one vulnerable or defenseless. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would connect to the concern for protecting the soul during the vulnerable transition of death.

[i] The imagery of prayer as incense is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok, as one section of the book is specifically titled 'Eter Anan HaKetoret' (Cloud of Incense Prayer), highlighting the kabbalistic understanding that properly formulated prayers create effects similar to the Temple incense offerings.

[ii] This request for divine guidance over speech would be especially relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of visiting the sick and dying, where proper speech is crucial. The book emphasizes the importance of appropriate communication during illness, neither falsely reassuring the patient nor causing unnecessary distress.

[iii] This verse's acceptance of righteous rebuke connects to Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on confession (vidui) as spiritually beneficial for the sick. The book presents illness as an opportunity for self-examination and correction.

[iv] The imagery of scattered bones at the mouth of Sheol (the grave) would resonate with Ma'avar Yabok's focus on proper preparation for death. The book's very title ('Crossing of the Yabok') refers to the soul's transition from life to death.

[v] This plea for protection from snares connects to Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework where illness and death involve navigating spiritual dangers. The book presents prayers and rituals as creating protective barriers against negative spiritual forces during vulnerable transitions.

[A] Or: "in the darkest places, like those who have died ages ago" — This alternative captures the psychological depth of the Hebrew phrase מַחֲשַׁכִּים (plural form suggesting multiple or intense darkness) and עוֹלָם (which can mean 'eternal' or 'ancient times'). This might better convey the profound spiritual desolation being described.

[B] Or: "my spirit faints and wraps itself around me" — The Hebrew verb התעטף has the specific connotation of being wrapped or enveloped, suggesting not just overwhelm but a constricting sensation. This alternative preserves the physical metaphor present in the original Hebrew.

[1] This psalm opens with an urgent appeal for divine attention using three different terms for prayer (תְּפִלָּה/prayer, תַּחֲנוּנַי/supplications, and implied request in "answer me"), creating an intensifying sequence that reflects the psalmist's desperation.

[2] This acknowledgment of universal human fallibility serves an important function in Ma'avar Yabok as part of deathbed confession, establishing that the ill person approaches God with humility rather than claiming personal righteousness.

[3] The Hebrew portrays the spirit as being wrapped or enveloped in distress (וַתִּתְעַטֵּף), creating a powerful image of spiritual suffocation that resonates with the experience of serious illness.

[i] Cf. Exodus 30:34-38 — This reference strengthens the connection between the psalm's prayer-as-incense metaphor and actual Temple worship. Ma'avar Yabok's 'Eter Anan HaKetoret' section specifically focuses on this parallel, presenting prayer as a substitute for Temple incense offerings that can create similar spiritual effects. | Cf. Leviticus 2:1-2 — The psalm's comparison of lifted hands to the 'minchat-arev' (evening offering) draws on Temple ritual to elevate personal prayer to the level of formal sacrifice. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this suggests that properly performed prayers for the sick and dying have sacrificial efficacy similar to Temple offerings. | Cf. Proverbs 27:6 — Psalm 141:5's positive view of righteous rebuke echoes this proverbial wisdom. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this supports the book's emphasis on honest communication with the sick and dying, including encouraging confession and spiritual self-examination during illness. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, fourth discourse — The psalm's central metaphor of prayer as incense (verse 2) directly connects to this major section of Ma'avar Yabok, which explains how properly formulated prayers create spiritual effects similar to the Temple ketoret, particularly for protection during vulnerable transitions like illness and death.

[ii] The Hebrew text attributes this psalm to David, though this is actually Psalm 143 (not Psalm 142 as indicated in the Hebrew text). The numbering discrepancy stems from differences between Hebrew and Christian Bible versification.

[iii] Literally "like the eternally dead" or "like those dead of old." This powerful image suggests being placed among those long forgotten in death, emphasizing the depth of the psalmist's distress.

[iv] The verb התעטף (to be overwhelmed/faint) creates a vivid image of the spirit being wrapped or enveloped in distress, similar to being smothered.

[A] Or: "my soul thirsts for You like a weary, drought-stricken land" — This alternative more fully captures the Hebrew עֲיֵפָה which conveys both exhaustion and dryness, emphasizing the desperate, life-or-death nature of the psalmist's spiritual thirst.

[1] This musical notation, appearing frequently in psalms, likely indicated a pause or musical interlude. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these pauses would create space for reflection during recitation at the bedside of the ill or dying.

[2] The psalmist expresses fear of joining "those who go down to the pit" (יֹרְדֵי בוֹר), a euphemism for death that connects directly to Ma'avar Yabok's central theme of the soul's transition.

[3] The psalm's conclusion moves from personal supplication to requesting divine judgment against enemies. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, these "enemies" would be interpreted as both human adversaries and the spiritual forces that threaten the soul during illness and death.

[4] This psalm is attributed to David and is part of a collection of psalms frequently recited for the sick and dying in Jewish tradition, as reflected in its inclusion in Ma'avar Yabok.

[i] The metaphor of the soul as a "parched land" thirsty for God is particularly significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, where illness is often portrayed as a spiritual drought that requires divine refreshment.

[ii] "Those who go down to the pit" is a common biblical euphemism for death. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this phrase has special significance as it relates to the book's central theme of crossing over from life to death.

[iii] "Level ground" (or "land of uprightness" in some translations) represents both moral rectitude and ease of journey—significant in Ma'avar Yabok's framework of spiritual preparation for the final journey of death.

[iv] Cf. Vidui (Confession) — The psalm's recognition that "no living being can be justified before You" establishes the proper humility required in confession, while its appeals for divine guidance and protection mirror the core elements of deathbed prayers seeking peaceful transition. | Cf. Psalm 30:4 — Both psalms employ the imagery of 'the pit' as a metaphor for death, with pleas to avoid this fate. In Ma'avar Yabok, this connection would be understood as reinforcing the central theme of divine rescue from death's realm. | Cf. Genesis 32:22-32 — The psalm's imagery of struggle, darkness, and eventual emergence onto 'level ground' parallels Jacob's night of wrestling at the Jabbok (the river referenced in the book's title), suggesting that spiritual struggle can lead to transformation. | Cf. Zohar I:79b — The psalm's appeal "For Your name's sake, O LORD, revive me" connects to kabbalistic teachings about invoking divine names to activate mercy, particularly relevant during illness when divine judgment is believed to be operating.

[A] Or: "for no one alive can be justified in Your presence" — This alternate translation better captures the legal connotation of "יִצְדַּק" (being declared innocent or justified) in the context of divine judgment, which is a key theme in this psalm.

[B] Or: "he has crushed my vitality to the earth" — The term "חַיָּתִי" (chayati) refers to one's life-force or vitality rather than just physical life. This captures the spiritual dimension of the psalmist's suffering that would be relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of illness and approaching death.

[C] Or: "my spirit is enveloped in darkness within me" — The verb "וַתִּתְעַטֵּף" implies being wrapped or covered, which in this context suggests the spirit being shrouded in darkness or despair, providing a more vivid image consistent with the psalm's theme of being in spiritual darkness.

[D] Or: "those who descend to the grave" — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which focuses on death and the afterlife, translating "בוֹר" as "grave" rather than "pit" more clearly connects to the book's central theme of the soul's transition at death.

[1] The appeal to God's faithfulness (emunah) and righteousness (tzedakah) represents the psalmist's reliance on divine attributes rather than personal merit, a theme emphasized in Ma'avar Yabok's approach to deathbed prayer.

[2] This powerful metaphor expresses spiritual thirst and was particularly meaningful in Ma'avar Yabok's context, where it would be understood as the soul's yearning for divine connection during illness or at the approach of death.

[3] The request for divine guidance through God's spirit takes on special significance in Ma'avar Yabok, where it would be interpreted as a prayer for spiritual guidance during the soul's journey from this world to the next.

[i] This verse acknowledges human inability to claim righteousness before divine judgment, a central concept in Jewish deathbed confession (vidui) which was emphasized in Ma'avar Yabok as essential spiritual preparation.

[ii] The phrase "like those long dead" reflects the experience of spiritual darkness during serious illness that Ma'avar Yabok addresses through its prayer sequences for the sick and dying.

[iii] This image of the soul as parched land thirsting for God was interpreted in kabbalistic tradition as representing the soul's profound yearning for divine connection, particularly during illness or approaching death.

[iv] The request for God's good spirit to guide the psalmist resonates with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on divine guidance for the soul during its transition from life to death.

[A] Or: "great sea creatures" — The term 'tanninim' refers to large aquatic creatures, sometimes translated as sea monsters, dragons, or serpents. 'Great sea creatures' may be more neutral and accurate without the potentially mythological connotations of 'monsters.'

[B] Or: "He has lifted up the strength of His people" — While 'horn' is the literal translation of 'keren,' the metaphorical meaning of strength or power might be clearer to modern readers unfamiliar with ancient Near Eastern symbolism where horns represented power and dignity.

[1] This refers to the ancient cosmological concept of waters stored above the firmament, as described in Genesis 1:6-7. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this would have been understood literally as part of the divine architecture of creation.

[2] This emphasizes the permanence of divine natural law. In the context of a prayer for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, this would remind the sufferer that their illness exists within an ordered cosmos governed by divine decree rather than chaotic forces.

[3] The Hebrew emphasizes that even seemingly destructive natural forces serve divine purposes. For the dying person, this would provide the theological reassurance that nothing—not even death itself—falls outside God's sovereignty.

[i] Cf. Psalm 30:4 — The reference to "those who descend to the pit" in Psalm 143:7 echoes language from Psalm 30, reinforcing the theme of divine rescue from death that would be particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of prayers for the sick and dying. | Cf. Job 9:2 — Psalm 143:2 echoes Job's recognition of human inadequacy before divine judgment, a theme that would resonate in Ma'avar Yabok's context of deathbed confession and spiritual preparation, where acknowledging one's inability to stand justified before God is a prerequisite for divine mercy. | Cf. Lamentations 3:6 — Psalm 143:3's imagery of dwelling "in darkness like those long dead" parallels Lamentations, suggesting that in Ma'avar Yabok's context, this psalm could help articulate the spiritual darkness experienced during serious illness while still expressing hope for divine intervention. | Cf. Zohar, Parshat Vayechi — Psalm 143:6's imagery of the soul as a parched land thirsting for God parallels kabbalistic concepts in the Zohar about the soul's yearning for divine connection, particularly relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of spiritual preparation for death as the ultimate union with the Divine.

Psalm 149:[1] Hallelujah! Sing to the LORD a new song, His praise in the assembly of the faithful. Let Israel rejoice in its Maker; let the children of Zion exult in their King. Let them praise His name with 2095R dancing, with timbrel and lyre let them sing to Him. For the LORD takes pleasure in His people; He adorns the humble with salvation. Let the faithful exult in glory; let them sing for joy upon their beds.[A] The high praises of God are in their throats, 2100R and a double-edged sword is in their hands,[2] to execute vengeance upon the nations, chastisements upon the peoples; to bind their kings with chains and their nobles with fetters of iron; to execute upon them the written judgment. This is glory for 2105R all His faithful ones.[B] Hallelujah!

[A] Or: "Let the faithful rejoice in glory; let them sing joyfully upon their resting places." — This alternative rendering uses 'rejoice' for 'יַעְלְזוּ' and 'resting places' for 'מִשְׁכְּבוֹתָם', which could better capture the dual meaning in Ma'avar Yabok's context—both literal beds for the sick and metaphorical resting places for the deceased.

[B] Or: "to carry out against them the judgment decreed. This is an honor for all His faithful

[1] I've added 'Psalm 149:' at the beginning to clearly identify the psalm, though this identification doesn't appear in the Hebrew text itself.

[2] The Hebrew 'חרב פיפיות' (literally 'sword of mouths') refers to a double-edged sword. In mystical interpretations, this represents the power of prayer and divine words to combat spiritual enemies, which would be particularly relevant for those using Ma'avar Yabok to prepare for death.

[i] Cf. Psalm 19 — Both Psalm 148 and Psalm 19 depict heavenly bodies as participants in divine praise, with Psalm 19 stating 'The heavens declare the glory of God' while Psalm 148 directly commands them to praise. The psalm draws on this cosmic praise tradition in which celestial bodies are portrayed as responsive to their Creator. | Cf. Genesis 1 — The psalm refers directly to God's creative command ('He commanded and they were created') and the establishment of natural boundaries that 'shall not pass away,' drawing on Genesis 1 where God creates through speech and establishes the boundaries of creation. This reinforces the theological point that created things should praise their Creator. | Cf. Isaiah 43:20-21 — Like Psalm 148, Isaiah 43:20-21 portrays creation (wild animals) giving honor to God and describes Israel as God's chosen people formed to declare divine praise. Both texts connect creation's praise with Israel's special covenant relationship.

[ii] Cf. Psalm 96:1 — The call for a "new song" connects this psalm to other liturgical texts that use this phrase. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this would suggest that the psalm offers a fresh perspective on praise, particularly appropriate during illness or approaching death when traditional expressions might seem insufficient. | Cf. Psalm 150 — In Ma'avar Yabok, Psalms 148-150 appear in sequence, creating a crescendo of praise. When recited for the sick or dying, these psalms would create a liturgical framework that moves the sufferer's focus from earthly troubles to cosmic praise, reframing their individual suffering within divine purpose. | Cf. Isaiah 59:17-19 — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, the military imagery would be interpreted spiritually—the faithful engaging in spiritual warfare against forces of illness and death through prayer and proper ritual observance. | Cf. Zohar on Pekudei — In Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework, this verse would be understood as referring to the continuing praise offered by righteous souls after death, reinforcing the book's teaching that the soul's divine service continues in the afterlife.

It is beneficial for the sick person to accustom themselves to occasionally recite[A] the prayer of Rabbeinu Saadia Gaon[4] which is written in our "Illuminators of Dawn" prayer book in the order ones." — This alternative uses 'judgment decreed' for 'מִשְׁפָּט כָּתוּב' and 'honor' for 'הָדָר', which might more clearly express the concept that participating in divine justice is an honor bestowed upon the righteous.

[A]Or: "It is good for the ill person to habituate themselves to periodically recite" — This alternate translation maintains the literal meaning of 'tov' (good) rather than 'beneficial' and uses 'periodically' instead of 'occasionally' for 'lifrakim', which might better convey the recommended regularity. The term 'habituate' more directly translates 'yargil' (accustom/habituate).

[1]This is both an opening and closing frame for the psalm, functioning as a liturgical call to praise that envelops the entire composition.

[2]The exact identification of the Hebrew musical instruments 'minim' and 'ugav' is uncertain. I've translated them as 'stringed instruments' and 'flute' based on the most common scholarly interpretations, though 'ugav' might also refer to a pipe organ or similar wind instrument.

[3]This final verse serves as the culmination of the psalm's increasing intensity, moving from the sanctuary to the heavens, from various instruments to all living creatures. This creates a crescendo effect where praise ultimately extends beyond human participants to include all breathing creatures.

[4]This is a notable recommendation since Saadia Gaon's works were highly esteemed, and the author is directing sick individuals to a specific prayer composed by this prominent authority, suggesting its special efficacy for healing.

[i]The Hebrew term 'rakia' (firmament) refers to the heavenly expanse above the earth. In Kabbalistic literature, this is understood as a specific celestial realm where divine power (oz) is manifested.

[ii]The shofar (ram's horn) is an ancient ceremonial instrument used in Jewish religious services, particularly on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Its piercing sound was believed to reach the highest heavens.

[iii]The phrase 'kol ha-neshamah' can be understood both as 'everything that has breath' and as 'with all of one's soul.' This dual meaning suggests that praise should be offered with one's complete being.

[iv]Cf. Psalm 148 — Psalm 150 parallels Psalm 148's structure but focuses on the means of praise (various instruments) rather than on who should praise. Together with Psalms 146-149, it forms part of the concluding Hallelujah collection that ends the Book of Psalms with escalating praise. | Cf. 2 Chronicles 5:11-14 — The instrumental praise in Psalm 150 evokes the Temple worship practices described in Chronicles, suggesting that the psalm may have functioned liturgically in Temple ceremonies. The psalm potentially provides a textual foundation for the musical practices described in historical narratives.

[v]Rabbeinu Saadia Gaon (882-942 CE) was a prominent Jewish philosopher, biblical commentator, and halachic authority who served as the head of the academy of Sura in Babylonia.

[vi]"Me'irei Shachar" (Illuminators of Dawn) appears to be a prayer book or collection compiled by the author, mentioned earlier in the text as a prayer society in Modena that gathered for morning prayers.

וחמישי וששי. ויחלקנה כפי רצונו בעת שירצה לבקש רחמים לפני קונו: וירגיל החולה להתוודות אחר כל ג׳ תפלות[i] כמו ביוה״כ[ii] ולומר סדר פטום הקטרת[iii] בנדרש בראש מאמר ד׳:[iv][v]

for Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. They may divide it according to their preference whenever they wish to seek mercy before their Creator.[A] The sick person should also become accustomed to confessing after each of the three daily prayers as on Yom Kippur,[1] and to recite the order of the Preparation of the Incense[2] as required at the beginning of the fourth discourse. 2125R

כשהולך האדם לבקר החולה[vi] יבקש עליו רחמים[vii] בפסוקים אלו:[viii]

When a person goes to visit the sick,[3] they should seek mercy for them[4] through these verses:[5] 2130R

[A] Or: "at times when they desire to implore mercy before their Maker" — This alternate translation uses 'implore' to better capture the supplicatory nature of 'levakesh rachamim' and uses 'Maker' as an alternate translation for 'kono' (their Creator/Master).

[1] This instruction effectively places the sick person in a constant state of spiritual preparation similar to Yom Kippur, Judaism's holiest day, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's view that illness requires intensive spiritual response.

[2] The incense offering recitation is given special prominence throughout Ma'avar Yabok. In Jewish mystical tradition, this prayer was considered particularly powerful for protection against illness and negative spiritual forces.

[3] Visiting the sick (bikur cholim) is considered one of the most important acts of loving-kindness (gemilut chasadim) in Judaism. Ma'avar Yabok devotes significant attention to the proper way to perform this mitzvah.

[4] The Hebrew 'yevakesh alav rachamim' implies not just ordinary prayer but specifically appealing to God's attribute of mercy (rachamim) rather than judgment (din). In kabbalistic thought, this distinction is crucial, especially for the ill.

[5] The text continues in subsequent sections with specific biblical verses arranged in particular orders. Ma'avar Yabok teaches that these verses, when recited with proper intention (kavanah), serve as vehicles for divine healing energy.

[i] Refers to the three daily prayers in Jewish tradition: Shacharit (morning), Mincha (afternoon), and Arvit/Ma'ariv (evening).

[ii] Abbreviation for "be-Yom ha-Kippurim" (on Yom Kippur), the Day of Atonement, when confession (vidui) is a central liturgical element.

[iii] The "Order of Preparing the Incense" is a prayer recalling the Temple incense offering, considered particularly potent for protection and spiritual elevation.

[iv] This refers to the beginning of the fourth discourse of Ma'avar Yabok, titled "Eter Anan HaKetoret" (Cloud of Incense Prayer), which focuses on the spiritual significance of the Temple incense offering.

[v] Cf. Fourth discourse of Ma'avar Yabok — This cross-reference shows how Ma'avar Yabok creates an integrated system of spiritual care, with different sections of the book supporting each other. The author directs readers from this practical instruction to the theological explanation provided elsewhere in the work. | Cf. Yom Kippur confession (vidui) — The recommendation to perform confession three times daily places the sick person in a constant state of spiritual preparation and purification similar to Judaism's holiest day, reflecting the gravity with which illness should be approached spiritually.

[vi] This text appears in a section of Ma'avar Yabok that provides instructions for visiting the sick (bikur cholim), which is considered an important religious obligation in Judaism.

[vii] The concept of 'seeking mercy' (בקשת רחמים) is central to Jewish healing prayers. This reflects the belief that divine mercy is a key component in the healing process.

[viii] Ma'avar Yabok places great emphasis on the recitation of specific biblical verses as having healing power. This reflects the kabbalistic belief that properly recited verses create spiritual channels for divine healing energy.

לֹא תְאֻנֶּה אֵלֶיךָ רָעָה וְנֶגַע לֹא יִקְרַב בְּאָהֳלֶיךָ: כִּי מַלְאָכָיו יְצַוֶּה לָךְ לִשְׁמָרְךָ בְּכָל דְּרָכֶיךָ: רְפָאֵנוּ יְיָ וְנֵרָפֵא הוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ וְנִוָּשֵׁעָה כִּי תְהִלָּתֵנוּ אָתָּה:

No evil shall befall you,[1] nor shall any plague come near your dwelling. For He shall command His angels concerning you,[2] to guard you in all your ways. Heal us, O LORD, and we shall be healed; save us, and we shall be saved, for You are our praise.[3] 2135R

For the meaning of these verses, see Discourse 1, Chapter 2. Also, see in Ein Yisrael, in Chapter Chelek, what they expounded on the verse "No evil shall befall you." And regarding the proper intention for visiting the sick, see also Chapter 14 of Discourse 2. 2140R

ואם החולה הוא בעל תורה יאמר עליו חבירו

If the sick person is a Torah scholar,[4] his friend who is visiting him should say:[5]

[1] The Hebrew employs a specific verb (תְאֻנֶּה from אנה) that suggests something happening by chance or accident, carrying the implication that even seemingly random misfortunes are under divine control.

[2] This verse has particular significance in Jewish mystical tradition, where specific angels are believed to offer protection during illness. Ma'avar Yabok elsewhere mentions the angels Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, and Nuriel as forming a protective shield around the sick person.

[3] The Hebrew term תְהִלָּתֵנוּ can be understood as both 'our praise' (what we offer to God) and 'our glory' (what God is to us), creating a reciprocal relationship where healing enables continued divine praise.

[4] This instruction begins a special prayer formula to be recited specifically when visiting a sick Torah scholar, indicating that Ma'avar Yabok prescribes different liturgical approaches based on the status or learning of the ill person.

[5] The text cuts off here, suggesting that what follows in the original text (but not included in this excerpt) would be the specific prayer to recite when visiting a sick Torah scholar.

[i] This verse from Psalm 91:10 is traditionally considered to have protective properties against harm and illness. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as a spiritual shield for the sick person.

[ii] This verse (Psalm 91:11) continues the protective theme with the concept of angelic guardianship, which is significant in Ma'avar Yabok's framework where proper prayers can invoke protective spiritual forces around the ill person.

[iii] This verse from Jeremiah 17:14 shifts from the protective language of Psalm 91 to a direct plea for healing. The sequence illustrates Ma'avar Yabok's approach of combining verses to create a therapeutic progression from protection to active healing.

[iv] Cf. Psalm 91:10-11 — These verses from Psalm 91 are quoted as a protective prayer for the sick person. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, they form part of a compilation of biblical verses specifically selected for their protective and healing properties. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — This verse from Jeremiah is added to the Psalm verses to create a cohesive prayer that moves from divine protection to a direct plea for healing. This combination exemplifies Ma'avar Yabok's method of weaving together biblical passages to create therapeutic spiritual progressions. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 6 of Siftei Tzedek — This prayer appears to be part of the collection of biblical verses that Ma'avar Yabok recommends for recitation when visiting the sick. The text earlier refers to 'Siftei Tzedek chapter 6' as containing specially selected biblical verses organized for healing purposes.

[v] Cf. Discourse 1, Chapter 2 — The author is directing readers to an earlier section of Ma'avar Yabok where the spiritual meanings of healing and protective verses are explained in detail. | Cf. Ein Yisrael — The author refers readers to rabbinic interpretations of Psalm 91:10 ('No evil shall befall you') found in this collection, likely explaining its protective powers against harm. | Cf. Chapter 14 of Discourse 2 — The author directs readers to another section of Ma'avar Yabok that details the spiritual intentions one should have when performing the mitzvah of visiting the sick (bikur cholim).

[vi] The term "ba'al torah" (lit. "master of Torah") refers to a person well-versed in Torah study and Jewish law, typically a Torah scholar or rabbi.

[A]Or: "the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Shekhinah" — Keeping the term 'Shekhinah' preserves the kabbalistic terminology that would resonate with readers familiar with Jewish mysticism.

[B]Or: "from the light of the Ancient Holy One" — Both translations are valid, but 'Ancient Holy One' places the emphasis on the antiquity first, which matches the Hebrew word order better.

[1]This opening formula is a common way to begin prayers in Jewish liturgy, especially petitionary prayers. The Aramaic term "ra'ava" carries connotations of divine favor and willingness beyond mere "will."

[2]This threefold invocation represents the core structures of kabbalistic theology through which divine blessing flows: God's middot (ethical attributes), the ten sefirot (emanations through which God interacts with creation), and the divine names (representing different aspects of divine power).

[3]This refers to mystical structures associated with the divine throne (merkavah), drawing on Ezekiel's vision but elaborated in kabbalistic literature to represent cosmic power structures through which divine energy flows.

[4]This represents a descending hierarchy of spiritual beings: the leaders of heavenly academies where righteous souls study Torah, the angels who serve as divine messengers, and the celestial hosts of higher and lower realms. The prayer invokes healing energy from each level of this spiritual hierarchy.

[i]Literally "his friend who is visiting him," referring to someone fulfilling the mitzvah of bikur cholim (visiting the sick).

[ii]This phrase employs the common kabbalistic pairing of "the Holy One, blessed be He" with "His Shekhinah (Divine Presence)," representing the masculine and feminine aspects of divinity in kabbalistic thought.

[iii]This passage invokes blessing through three foundational kabbalistic concepts: God's attributes (middot), the ten sefirot (divine emanations), and the divine names. This reflects the kabbalistic understanding that these aspects of divinity provide the channels through which divine blessing flows into our world.

[iv]This refers to the mystical structure of the divine throne (Merkavah), with its four supports and six levels, drawing on Ezekiel's vision and elaborated in kabbalistic literature.

[v]The prayer invokes healing from a descending hierarchy of celestial beings: masters of the heavenly academies, angels, upper hosts, and lower hosts. This reflects the kabbalistic view that divine influence descends through multiple spiritual levels.

[vi]"Atika Kadisha" (Holy Ancient One) is a term in kabbalistic literature for the highest aspect of divinity, often associated with Keter (Crown), the highest sefirah and the source of mercy beyond normal judgment.

It is written in Masechet Semachot: "To one who is approaching death,[A] they say to him, 'Confess,'[2] for many have confessed and did not die,[B] and many did not confess and died, and many walk on their feet in the marketplace and confess, and by the merit of confessing you will live,[C] etc.' [Confession should address] neither matters that give life nor matters that cause death,[3] but rather [practical matters] such as: perhaps you lent something, or perhaps you borrowed from someone, perhaps you deposited something with others, or perhaps others deposited some-

[A] Or: "one who is inclined toward death" — The Hebrew term 'noteh' literally means 'inclined' or 'leaning.' While 'approaching death' captures the intended meaning in modern English, this more literal translation might be preferred in certain scholarly contexts.

[B] Or: "for many have made confession and yet did not die" — This alternate adds 'yet' to emphasize the contrast between the expectation of death and the actual outcome, which might better capture the rhetorical force of the original.

[C] Or: "and through the merit of your confession you shall live" — This alternative is slightly more formal and emphasizes the causal relationship between confession and continued life more explicitly.

[1] This closing verse comes from Psalms 19:15 and is a standard closing formula in Jewish liturgy, used here to frame this kabbalistic healing prayer within traditional forms.

[2] The Hebrew term for confession here (התודה/hitvadeh) specifically refers to the ritual of deathbed confession (vidui), a formalized practice in Judaism for those approaching death.

[3] This somewhat enigmatic phrase likely means that the confession should focus on practical matters rather than making declarations about whether the person will live or die, avoiding both false reassurances and premature resignation.

[i] Cf. Zohar — This prayer employs classic Zoharic terminology and concepts, particularly in its references to the sefirot, divine names, and the Ancient Holy One (Atika Kadisha), showing its grounding in kabbalistic cosmology. | Cf. Siddur — The author frames this kabbalistic healing prayer within traditional liturgical forms by concluding with this familiar closing verse, connecting mystical petition with established prayer patterns. | Cf. Sefer Yetzirah — The prayer's reference to 'the ten sefirot' builds on the foundational kabbalistic cosmology established in Sefer Yetzirah, though the elaborated structure with the celestial hierarchy shows later kabbalistic development.

[ii] Masechet Semachot (literally 'Tractate of Joys,' euphemistically referring to mourning) is also known as Evel Rabbati, a minor tractate of the Talmud dealing with laws of mourning and death rituals.

[iii] This phrase refers to someone who is gravely ill and expected to die. It establishes when the deathbed confession (vidui) ritual should be initiated.

[iv] This statement is significant as it addresses a potential concern that confessing might be seen as giving up hope. The text emphasizes that confession is not only for those about to die, as many who confess continue to live and walk about.

[v] This phrase is somewhat cryptic but refers to the proper content of the confession. It suggests avoiding both overly optimistic statements that promise life and fatalistic ones that assume death, focusing instead on practical matters.

[vi] The emphasis on settling financial and interpersonal matters shows that deathbed confession in the Jewish tradition concerns not only spiritual preparation but also ensuring one's worldly affairs are in order, particularly regarding obligations to others.

[vii] Cf. Shabbat 32a — This reference establishes that deathbed confession was a well-established thing with you,[1] etc."

עיין פ״ט מאמר א׳ ובפרק הנזכר יש סדר הודוי להרמב״ן ז״ל:

See Chapter 9 of the First Discourse, and in the aforementioned chapter there is the order of confession [vidui] by Ramban, of blessed memory.[A]

Before the confession, the sick person should wash their hands, wrap themselves in a tallit with tzitzit,[2] and set aside for charity—either physically with their hand or verbally with their mouth—at least 26 perutot (small coins), or 91, or 112.[3] The intention behind this corresponds to the three Divine Names: YHVH, Ehyeh, and Adonut, as explained elsewhere. In chapters 12 and 16, you will find a good explanation for why it is beneficial that the confession take place in the morning, when the divine attribute of Chesed (Loving-kindness) dominates. And in chapter 19, you will find the reason for the Jewish custom of gathering ten men, which is because holiness dwells among them, and through the ten sparks of their souls, they will

[A] Or: "Ramban's confession ritual, may his memory be a blessing" — This alternative more explicitly indicates that this refers to a ritual formula composed by or attributed to Ramban (Nachmanides) rather than just an 'order' which might be interpreted as instructions about confession.

[1] The focus on financial and interpersonal obligations demonstrates that Jewish deathbed practices were concerned with both spiritual preparation and ensuring that worldly affairs were properly settled.

[2] The Hebrew term יתעפף literally means 'to wrap oneself' or 'to cover oneself,' and specifically refers to the ritual practice of wrapping oneself in a prayer shawl (tallit) with ritual fringes (tzitzit).

[3] These specific numbers are not arbitrary but correspond to the numerical values (gematria) of divine names in Jewish mysticism: 26 equals the value of YHVH (ה-ו-ה-י), 91 represents a combination of divine names, and 112 corresponds to a particular calculation involving all three divine names mentioned.

practice in rabbinic Judaism. The Talmudic text reinforces the idea that confession (vidui) is appropriate for those who are ill or facing death. | Cf. Yoreh De'ah 338-339 — Later halakhic codes systematized the practices mentioned in Ma'avar Yabok, showing how these traditions became normative in Jewish practice. The reference demonstrates that the author is working within an established halakhic framework regarding deathbed practices. | Cf. Masechet Semachot (Evel Rabbati) 1:2 — The author is directly quoting from an authoritative rabbinic source to establish the importance of confession for the dying. By citing this text, he grounds his more mystical and elaborate approach to deathbed rituals in recognized rabbinic tradition.

[i] These specific numbers correspond to the numerical values (gematria) of the divine names mentioned: 26 for YHVH (יהוה), 91 for the combination of YHVH and Adonai when fully spelled out in a specific way, and 112 for the combined value of all three names in a certain calculation method.

[ii] In Kabbalistic thought, different times of day are associated with different divine attributes. Morning is connected to Chesed (Loving-kindness), making it an opportune time for confession as divine mercy is more accessible.

[iii] This refers to a minyan, the quorum of ten Jewish men required for certain religious obligations. Here, the text provides a mystical explanation for this traditional requirement.

Master of the Worlds,[A] You who are Lord of kings[B] and revealer of mysteries.[5] May it be Your will to explain words through my mouth,[6] to fulfill in 2200R

[A] Or: "Sovereign of all Realms" — While 'Master of the Worlds' is accurate, 'Sovereign of all Realms' better captures the cosmic scope implied by the Aramaic phrase, which refers to God's dominion across all spiritual dimensions.

[B] Or: "Master of sovereigns" — 'Master of sovereigns' maintains the hierarchical relationship while avoiding the gender-specific 'kings' and emphasizing God's authority over all rulers.

[1] The term מסטין (accusers) derives from the Hebrew root ש-ט-ן (Satan) and refers to spiritual forces that act as prosecutors against a person in the heavenly court. This reflects the Jewish mystical concept that illness can have spiritual causes related to divine judgment.

[2] The phrase "פגע ולא פגע רע" echoes language from Psalm 91, known as the 'Song Against Harmful Occurrences' (שיר של פגעים), which is traditionally recited for protection. The text suggests that genuine repentance creates a spiritual shield around the ill person.

[3] While this instruction is directed specifically at Torah scholars, it reflects the broader theme in Ma'avar Yabok of proper spiritual preparation for death. The author emphasizes certain practices for the learned, with the expectation they would serve as examples for the community.

[4] This phrase connects to Ma'avar Yabok's central purpose of providing guidance for proper spiritual preparation at the end of life. The text suggests that regular recitation of this prayer throughout life, but especially near death, creates spiritual protection for the soul's transition.

[5] This epithet for God ('galei razin') recognizes Him as the source of all mystical knowledge, establishing the author's position that true insight comes through divine revelation rather than human reasoning alone.

[6] The phrase emphasizes the author's view of himself as a channel for divine wisdom rather than its originator, a common expression of humility in kabbalistic writings.

[i] This Aramaic phrase, meaning "the Divine Presence comes before and arrives," is characteristic of Zoharic language. It suggests that the Divine Presence arrives preemptively to protect one who has sincerely repented.

[ii] Cf. Psalms 91 — The text mentions the removal of harmful spiritual forces, which connects to the protective function of Psalm 91, traditionally known as 'shir shel pega'im' (song against harmful occurrences). | Cf. Zohar — The Aramaic phrase 'שכינה קדמא ואתיא' (the Divine Presence comes before and arrives) is characteristic of Zoharic language and reflects the kabbalistic concept that divine protection specially precedes those who have genuinely repented. | Cf. Minyan traditions — The text provides a kabbalistic rationale for the traditional requirement of ten men (minyan) for important rituals, explaining it in terms of the ten sparks of their souls providing spiritual protection for the ill person.

[iii] This heading indicates this is Chapter 24 of the First Discourse (Ma'amar Alef) of Ma'avar Yabok.

[iv] An abbreviation for "Talmid Chacham" (Torah scholar).

[v] The term "petirah" is a euphemism for death, literally meaning "departure." The instruction emphasizes the importance of this prayer specifically when approaching death.

[vi] This prayer begins in Aramaic, the language of the Zohar and many mystical texts, signaling its connection to kabbalistic traditions.

לְקַיֶּמָא בִּי דַּאי קְרָא וְאָנֹכִי אֶהְיֶה עִם פִּיךָ[i] דְּלָא אֵיעוֹל בְּכִסּוּפָּא[ii] קָדָמָךְ וְקָדָם רֵישֵׁי מָתִיבָתָא דִּרְקִיעָא: וְאֶזְכֶּה לְמִשְׁמַע מִלִּין וְרָזִין דְּאוֹרַיְתָא מֵרֵישֵׁי מָתִיבָתֵי עִלָּאֵי:[iii iv]

Chapter 17 of the First Discourse will explain some of the intentions behind the confession[3] (vidui) ritual. If you recall what we wrote in our Me'irei Shachar commentary,[4] your mind will be at ease regarding the reason for the confession and why it

[A] Or: "the chief sages of the celestial academies" — This alternate translation more fully conveys the concept of the mystical scholarly institutions believed to exist in the spiritual realms, where departed scholars continue their Torah study.

[1] By invoking God's promise to Moses, the author suggests a parallel between Moses receiving divine guidance for his speech and the author seeking similar assistance in articulating mystical teachings.

[2] The prayer concludes with the desire to receive wisdom directly from the celestial yeshivot, the mystical academies where departed sages continue their Torah studies, suggesting the author seeks knowledge beyond ordinary human understanding.

[3] The Hebrew term 'kavanot' (intentions) has special significance in Kabbalah, referring to specific mystical concentrations or meditations that accompany prayer and ritual. The author is likely referring to these deeper spiritual dimensions of the confession ritual rather than merely its practical aspects.

[4] This work was apparently another text by the same author that contained a more detailed explanation of the mystical significance of the confession ritual. The cross-reference demonstrates how Ma'avar Yabok is part of a broader system of religious writings by this author.

[i] A direct quote from Exodus 4:12, where God promises Moses divine assistance with speech. This biblical quotation appears in Hebrew within the otherwise Aramaic prayer.

[ii] The concept of 'entering without shame' (lacking embarrassment) is a recurring theme in kabbalistic literature, referring to the soul's desire to appear properly prepared when facing divine or elevated spiritual entities.

[iii] In kabbalistic tradition, particularly in the Zohar, the 'supernal academies' are where souls of righteous scholars continue studying Torah after death, headed by great sages of previous generations.

[iv] Cf. Exodus 4:12 — The author is invoking God's promise to Moses as a request for divine assistance in articulating spiritual wisdom, positioning himself as a vessel for divine communication like Moses. | Cf. Zohar — The author draws on Zoharic concepts of heavenly academies presided over by great sages, expressing hope to receive wisdom from these exalted sources rather than relying solely on his own understanding. | Cf. Daniel 2:28 — By using this phrase from Daniel, the author acknowledges God as the ultimate source of mystical knowledge, positioning himself as a recipient rather than originator of spiritual insights.

[v] This indicates 'Chapter 17 of the First Discourse' of Ma'avar Yabok.

[vi] Me'irei Shachar (Illuminators of Dawn) appears to be another work by the same author, likely a prayer book or collection. It shares its name with a prayer society in Modena that gathered for morning prayers, as mentioned elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok.

[vii] Many traditional Jewish confession prayers are structured alphabetically, with each sin or phrase beginning with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. This provides a comprehensive framework and aids memory.

[viii] Cf. Me'irei Shachar — The author is directing readers to consult his other work for a more comprehensive explanation of the confession ritual and its structure, suggesting a systematic approach to his religious writings across multiple texts. | Cf. Alphabetical confession prayers — Many traditional Jewish confession prayers, including the Yom Kippur 'Al Chet' confession, are structured follows alphabetical order.[A 1]

ועיקר ודוי ש״מ[i] צריך שיאמר ע״י סרסור[ii] כנתבאר פי״ט מאמר א׳:[iii] יתחיל ויאמר מזמור בקראי ענני סימן ד׳[iv] ויפתח בשבירות לב על עונותיו:[v vi]

The essential confession for a deathly ill person[B] must be said through an intermediary[C] as explained in Chapter 19 of the First Discourse: he should begin by reciting Psalm 4[2] (“Answer me when I call”) and commence with a broken heart[D] regarding his sins.[3]

(תהלים ד) לַמְנַצֵּחַ בִּנְגִינוֹת מִזְמוֹר לְדָוִד: בְּקָרְאִי עֲנֵנִי אֱלֹהֵי

For the Chief Musician, with stringed instruments.[4] A Psalm of David. Answer me when I

[A] Or: “according to the alef-bet” — Using ‘alef-bet’ instead of ‘alphabetical order’ preserves the Hebrew terminology for the alphabet, which might be preferable in a scholarly translation that aims to maintain cultural specificity.

[B] Or: “one who is terminally ill” — The abbreviation ש״מ (shechiv mera) refers to someone gravely ill and near death. ‘Terminally ill’ better conveys this medical state in modern English, while ‘deathly ill person’ is more literal but less precise.

[C] Or: “through a mediator” — The term ‘סרסור’ (sarsor) refers to someone who facilitates between parties. While ‘intermediary’ is accurate, ‘mediator’ might better convey the role of guiding the confession process.

[D] Or: “with contrition” — While ‘broken heart’ is the literal translation, ‘contrition’ might better capture the religious concept of remorse for sins in this context of confession.

[1] The alphabetical structure of confession prayers has both practical and mystical significance in Jewish tradition. Practically, it helps ensure comprehensiveness (covering sins ‘from A to Z’). Mystically, it is believed to access all spiritual channels represented by the Hebrew letters, which in Kabbalah are considered building blocks of creation.

[2] Psalm 4 begins with a plea for divine attention (“Answer me when I call”) and includes themes of being set apart by God, finding peace, and trust in divine protection—all appropriate themes for someone facing death.

[3] Jewish tradition emphasizes that confession (vidui) must be accompanied by genuine remorse rather than merely reciting formulaic words. This emotional state was considered crucial for effective spiritual preparation for death.

[4] These musical notations at the beginning of the psalm suggest it was originally meant for public worship with instrumental accompaniment. In Ma’avar Yabok, it serves as part of a private devotional sequence for the sick or dying.

in alphabetical order, with each sin or phrase beginning with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The author is explaining the reasoning behind this structure, which he apparently discussed more fully in his other work.

[i] The abbreviation ש״מ stands for שביב מרע (shechiv mera), a legal term in Jewish law referring to someone who is gravely ill and presumed to be on their deathbed.

[ii] The word סרסור (sarsor) literally means “agent” or “broker” but in this context refers to someone who assists the dying person with their confession, possibly because the ill person might be too weak to recite the full confession themselves.

[iii] This is a cross-reference to Chapter 19 of the First Discourse of Ma’avar Yabok, where the author previously explained this practice in detail.

[iv] This refers to Psalm 4, which begins with “Answer me when I call” (בְּקָרְאִי עֲנֵנִי). The term סימן ד׳ simply means “number 4,” identifying the psalm.

[v] This phrase emphasizes the importance of genuine contrition during confession. It’s not merely a ritual recitation but requires sincere remorse for one’s sins.

[vi] Cf. Masechet Semachot — Ma’avar Yabok draws on this minor tractate (also called Evel Rabbati) for its guidance on deathbed confession practices, showing how the text grounds its instructions in established rabbinic literature. | Cf. Psalm 4 — The instruction to begin with this psalm suggests it was considered particularly appropriate for deathbed confession, likely because it contains themes of divine mercy and protection that would comfort someone facing death. | Cf. Chapter 19, First Discourse of Ma’avar Yabok — The author’s cross-reference to an earlier section of Ma’avar Yabok shows the book’s systematic organization as a reference manual, with different sections elaborating on various aspects of deathbed practices.

call, O God of my righteousness! You have relieved me in my distress; be gracious to me and hear my prayer. O sons of men,[A] how long shall my glory be turned to shame? How long will you love emptiness and seek falsehood? Selah. But know that the LORD has set apart the godly for Himself;[B] the LORD will hear when I call to Him. Be angry, and do not sin;[C] meditate in your hearts upon your beds, and be silent. Selah. Offer sacrifices of righteousness,[1] and trust in the LORD. Many are saying, "Who will show us any good?" Lift up the light of Your countenance upon us, O LORD! You have put gladness in my heart, more than when their grain and new wine abound. In peace I will both lie down and sleep,[2] for You alone, O LORD, make me dwell in safety.

[A] Or: "Men of rank" — The Hebrew phrase 'bnei ish' can specifically refer to men of importance or high rank, as opposed to ordinary people. In the context of the psalm, David may be addressing those in positions of power who are turning against him.

[B] Or: "His faithful one" — The singular form 'chasid' (devout/faithful one) with the possessive 'lo' (for Himself) could be translated in the singular rather than the plural, suggesting that God sets apart each faithful person individually.

[C] Or: "Tremble and do not sin" — The Hebrew 'rigzu' can mean 'tremble' or 'be disturbed/agitated' rather than specifically 'be angry.' This interpretation suggests reverent fear rather than mere anger, which fits the religious context better.

[1] In the post-Temple era when Ma'avar Yabok was written, 'sacrifices of righteousness' would be understood as prayer, repentance, and charitable deeds—precisely the spiritual practices recommended for those approaching death.

[2] The psalm's conclusion expresses profound trust in divine protection, making it particularly appropriate for the sick or dying who seek similar peace in their vulnerable state. The confidence in safe repose under divine care reflects Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper spiritual preparation for death.

[i] The direct appeal to God as "my righteousness" is significant in the context of illness and approaching death, as it expresses confidence in divine justice even when physical circumstances suggest abandonment.

[ii] The phrase "speak in your hearts upon your beds" has special significance in Ma'avar Yabok's context, as it refers to the practice of self-examination and confession while bedridden—precisely the situation of those who are ill or dying.

[iii] The language of peaceful sleep serves as a euphemism for death in many biblical contexts. In a prayer recited as part of deathbed confessions, this would have dual meaning—both literal sleep and the final sleep of death.

[iv] Cf. Psalm 3:5 — Both Psalm 3:5 and Psalm 4:8 conclude with expressions of peaceful rest despite distress, suggesting that Psalm 4 may have been composed as an evening prayer for the sick or dying person. The mention of lying down in peace would be particularly comforting in the context of Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences for the ill. | Cf. Ephesians 4:26 — The New Testament quotes Psalm 4:4, suggesting this psalm's relevance to spiritual reconciliation and inner peace before sleep. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this would be meaningful for encouraging the sick person to resolve emotional and spiritual conflicts before the possibility of death. | Cf. Zohar III:204b — The Zohar connects Psalm 4:4 ('meditate in your hearts upon your beds') to the practice of examining one's conscience before sleep, which parallels Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on confession and spiritual preparation before death. The psalm's inclusion in deathbed prayers suggests this connection between nightly spiritual accounting and final preparation.

My God and God of my fathers,[A] may my prayer come before You, and do not ignore my supplication, for I am not brazen-faced or stiff-necked (and if she is a woman, she should say: for I am not brazen-faced or stiff-necked, and so in every place where necessary) to say before You, LORD my God and God of my fathers, that I am righteous and have not sinned. Rather, I have sinned, I have transgressed, I have rebelled, I and my fathers:

I have become guilty. I have eaten forbidden and abominable things.[1] I have betrayed. I have spoken rashly with my lips. I have stolen. My heart has become haughty and my eyes proud. I have spoken slander and idle words. I have perverted. I have spread malicious gossip and emitted seed in vain. I have acted wickedly in planning sin and in evil thoughts. I have acted deliberately. I have committed fornication and disrespected teachers and parents. I have extorted. I have profaned the name of the LORD in private and in public. I have desecrated Sabbaths and holy days. I have attributed falsehood. I have defiled my thoughts with forbidden ideas and impulses. I have defiled the holy covenant.[B] I have given evil advice. I have been arrogant regarding Your Torah. I have lied. I have convened gatherings not for the sake of Heaven. I have used my tongue for mockery.[2] I have rebelled. I have acted treach-

[A] Or: "My God and God of my ancestors" — A gender-neutral translation of 'avotai' as 'ancestors' rather than 'fathers' would be more inclusive for contemporary readers, especially since the prayer includes instructions for female worshippers. This option maintains the theological content while using more inclusive language.

[B] Or: "I have defiled the covenant of circumcision" — In rabbinic literature, 'brit kodesh' often specifically refers to circumcision, which is considered a physical sign of the covenant between God and the Jewish people. This more specific translation clarifies the nature of this particular transgression, which likely refers to sexual impropriety.

[1] The Hebrew confession follows an alphabetical acrostic pattern, with each series of confessions beginning with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. This literary device, common in Jewish liturgical texts, serves both as a memory aid and as a way to suggest comprehensiveness—covering sins 'from A to Z.'

[2] The Hebrew letter ל (lamed) begins this confession, but in the next line, the text moves to מ (mem), skipping the expected progression. This irregularity may indicate textual corruption

[i] This parenthetical instruction indicates that the confession text provides gender-specific variations for women, demonstrating the author's attention to making the prayer accessible to all. Such gender-specific liturgical instructions were relatively progressive for their time.

[ii] The confession follows a quasi-alphabetical structure, with each line beginning with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. This format follows traditional Jewish confessional prayers like the Yom Kippur 'Al Chet' and serves as a comprehensive framework to ensure no type of sin is overlooked.

[iii] The term 'יִהַרְתִּי' (yiharti) likely means 'I have been arrogant/presumptuous,' particularly in relation to Torah learning. This reflects the Jewish concept that true Torah study requires humility.

[A] Or: "I have cast covetous glances" — The Hebrew phrase refers to improper gazing or looking, particularly with sexual intent. 'Cast covetous glances' might better capture the specific impropriety of looking at what is forbidden to desire.

or deliberate composition choice, which is not uncommon in alphabetical acrostics in Hebrew literature.

[1] The metaphor of 'casting off the yoke' (פָּרַקְתִּי עוֹל) draws from agricultural imagery where an animal removes the yoke that directs its labor. This powerful metaphor appears frequently in rabbinic literature to describe rejection of divine authority.

[2] This contrast between divine truth and human wickedness reflects a fundamental theological concept in Judaism that even in confessing sin, one affirms God's justice. This represents the concept of 'tzidduk ha-din' (justification of divine judgment), which is particularly emphasized in contexts of illness and death.

[i] This phrase refers to denying a deposit or loan, a specific transgression mentioned in Leviticus 5:21-26. Including such specific legal infractions alongside general moral failings shows how this confession integrates ritual, ethical, and interpersonal dimensions of Jewish law.

[ii] This line echoes Nehemiah 9:33, acknowledging divine justice in all circumstances. This theological affirmation of divine righteousness even in suffering is a core element of traditional Jewish confession (vidui).

[iii] Cf. Yom Kippur Vidui — This confession in Ma'avar Yabok draws from and expands upon the traditional Yom Kippur confessional prayers, adapting them specifically for deathbed recitation. The alphabetical structure and many of the specific sins mentioned parallel the liturgical Yom Kippur confessions, showing how Ma'avar Yabok adapts established liturgical forms for end-of-life contexts. | Cf. Leviticus — The specific mention of 'teshument yad' (deposit) directly references

Master of all the worlds, it is revealed and known before Your throne of glory that my healing is in Your hand and my death is in Your hand. May it be Your will, LORD my God and God of my fathers, that I shall not die from this illness [to be said three times]. (It is good to say "that I shall not die" in one breath without pausing between repetitions.) Sustain me as You sustained Hezekiah, king of Judah, in his illness,[2] and rescue me from poverty.[B] Complete me from day until night.[C] Weigh me and judge me in the 2295R 2300R

[A] Or: "Then he shall recite together with the one confessing:" — This is a more direct translation that emphasizes the joint recitation aspect, which might be clearer in some contexts.

[B] Or: "and cut me off from affliction" — The Hebrew word 'וּמַדַּלָּה' can be understood as 'cut off/separate' rather than 'rescue,' and 'דַּלָּה' can refer to affliction or lowliness rather than strictly poverty. This alternative reflects a plea to be separated from one's suffering rather than specifically from poverty.

[C] Or: "From day until night You will make an end of me" — This phrase from Isaiah 38:12-13 can alternatively be understood as God bringing the person's life to completion within a day (from morning to night), reflecting the brevity of life when facing mortality. This interpretation aligns with Hezekiah's lament about God ending his life.

[1] The Hebrew uses three distinct terms for wrongdoing: 'avonot' (iniquities), 'pesha'im' (transgressions/rebellious acts), and 'chata'im' (sins/errors). This tripartite classification of wrongdoing is traditional in Jewish thought, distinguishing between unintentional errors, willful violations, and rebellious acts against divine authority.

[2] This references the biblical account in 2 Kings 20 and Isaiah 38 where King Hezekiah fell mortally ill but was granted healing and fifteen additional years of life after his prayer to God. This story serves as a powerful precedent for divine healing in Jewish tradition.

the biblical laws in Leviticus regarding misappropriation of entrusted property, showing how this confession integrates specific legal infractions from Torah alongside general moral failings. | Cf. Nehemiah — The phrase 'You are righteous concerning all that has come upon me, for You have acted truthfully, while I have acted wickedly' echoes Nehemiah's communal confession. This shows how Ma'avar Yabok incorporates biblical confessional language, particularly the theological affirmation of divine justice even in suffering.

[i] This abbreviation stands for 'achar kach' (after this/afterward) and is a common liturgical instruction marking the sequence of prayer recitation.

[ii] From the root 'vidui' (confession), this term specifically refers to the sick or dying person who is reciting the deathbed confession, a central ritual in Jewish preparation for death.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This brief liturgical instruction serves as a transition between the explanation of confession practices and the actual prayer text that follows. It indicates that the prayer leader should recite the following confession together with the sick or dying person, emphasizing the communal aspect of the deathbed ritual.

[iv] The instruction is to repeat the phrase "that I shall not die from this illness" three times, a common practice in Jewish prayers where certain phrases are repeated three times for emphasis.

[v] This parenthetical note provides specific instructions on how to recite the previous phrase—without pausing between repetitions, emphasizing the urgency and continuity of the prayer.

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic concept that the suffering of illness and death can serve as atonement for sins, transforming the physical body into a metaphorical sacrificial altar that purifies the soul.
[2] This begins a direct quotation from Psalm 16:11, which continues with "in Your presence is fullness of joy; at Your right hand are pleasures forevermore." This verse is traditionally associated with the afterlife and divine reward.
[3] This is the Shema, the central declaration of Jewish faith from Deuteronomy 6:4. Reciting the Shema is particularly significant for someone approaching death, as it is traditionally the final prayer a Jewish person should say before dying.

[i] The phrase "bar minan" (literally "separate from us") is a euphemistic way of referring to death, similar to saying "God forbid" in English.
[ii] This parenthetical note indicates that some are careful not to use the euphemism "bar minan" when talking about one's own death, and references that Ramban's (Nachmanides) version of this prayer in Chapter 9 of the work includes this phrase differently.
[iii] This indicates a textual variation for women, who should substitute "the righteous women" instead of "the righteous" (men), showing the prayer's adaptability for different genders.
[iv] The instruction indicates that the phrase "The LORD God is truth, and Moses is truth, and His Torah is truth" should be repeated three times, which is a common liturgical pattern in Jewish prayers.

[A] Or: "If the sick person is lucid and coherent" — This alternate translation emphasizes the cognitive clarity needed for the full confession ritual, which might be preferable in contexts where the modern medical understanding of mental competence is being emphasized.

[1] This phrase repeats the declaration from 1 Kings 18:39, which was the response of the Israelites after Elijah's contest with the prophets of Baal, and has become a powerful affirmation of monotheism in Jewish tradition.

[2] This references God's self-revelation to Moses at the burning bush in Exodus 3:14, where God identifies Himself as "Ehyeh Asher Ehyeh" (I Am That I Am), understood in Jewish mysticism as expressing God's eternal and unchanging nature.

[i] Cf. Isaiah 38 — This prayer explicitly references Hezekiah's healing as a precedent, invoking the biblical account as a paradigm for divine healing in response to sincere prayer. | Cf. Psalm 16:11 — The psalm verse is quoted to express hope for divine guidance after death, suggesting that even if physical healing doesn't occur, the soul will find its path to eternal joy in God's presence. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok Chapter 9 — The text references an alternative version of this prayer attributed to Ramban found elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok, indicating that this prayer exists in multiple versions with slight variations. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:4 — The inclusion of the Shema prayer indicates this text is meant for someone potentially approaching death, as Jewish tradition prescribes reciting the Shema as one's final words.

[ii] This phrase literally means "if the sick person's mind is settled upon him," which refers to mental clarity or soundness of mind, indicating that the person is cognitively able to engage in the confession ritual.

[iii] "Ha-Ribon ha-nizkar le'eil" refers to "the Master [prayer] mentioned above," indicating a prayer beginning with "Ribon" (Master of the Universe) that was referenced earlier in the text.

[iv] "Al Chet ve-gomer" refers to the "Al Chet" confession prayer recited on Yom Kippur, which begins with "For the sin" and systematically lists various categories of sins. "Ve-gomer" (etc.) indicates that the full, well-known prayer should be recited.

[v] "Oseh Shalom Bimromav ve-go'" refers to the concluding prayer "He who makes peace in His high places," which typically ends many Jewish prayers, including the Kaddish. The abbreviation "ve-go'" (etc.) indicates that the rest of this familiar prayer formula should be recited.

[vi] Cf. Yom Kippur liturgy — The adaptation of Yom Kippur liturgy for deathbed confession shows how death was viewed as a moment of ultimate judgment similar to Yom Kippur, with the confession serving a similar purpose of spiritual purification before facing divine judgment. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This instruction is part of Ma'avar Yabok's systematic approach to deathbed lation more explicitly connects the prayer to its Yom Kippur origins, which might be helpful for readers less familiar with Jewish liturgy.

[A] Or: “and likewise for what I have caused others [to sin]” — The Hebrew phrase is somewhat ambiguous and could specifically refer to causing others to sin, which is considered particularly serious in Jewish tradition. This alternate translation makes this implication more explicit.

[B] Or: “through Your abundant compassion and Your great loving-kindness” — This alternate translation uses theological terms (‘compassion’ and ‘loving-kindness’) that more closely align with traditional English renderings of the Hebrew theological concepts of ‘rachamim’ and ‘chesed’.

[1] This prayer formula concludes many Jewish prayers, including the Kaddish. Its inclusion here shows how the deathbed confession was structured to follow established prayer patterns familiar to the dying person and those attending them.

[2] This confession begins by acknowledging sins committed under various states of consciousness and volition, moving from least culpable (under compulsion) to most culpable (deliberately, openly).

[3] The repetitive structure of this confession creates a comprehensive accounting of sin affecting every aspect of one’s being. The confession systematically addresses sins committed through one’s physical body and through all levels of the soul, creating a complete spiritual inventory.

rituals, offering a complete liturgical framework with options based on the sick person’s condition. The text creates a hierarchy of confession options, with this being the most complete version for those capable of full participation.

[i] The Hebrew text uses abbreviations with quotation marks: רַמַ״ח for 248 and שַׁסַ״ה for 365. These numbers have mystical significance in Judaism, with 248 corresponding to the traditional count of positive commandments and the supposed number of limbs in the human body, while 365 corresponds to negative commandments and the days of the solar year.

[ii] This refers to the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy revealed to Moses in Exodus 34:6-7, which form a central element in Jewish penitential prayers. The word ‘sod’ (mystery/secret) indicates that the text is referring to the kabbalistic understanding of these attributes.

[A] Or: "through the mystical power of Your Thirteen Attributes" — The term 'sod' in kabbalistic contexts often refers not just to a 'mystery' but specifically to the esoteric or mystical dimension of interpretation. This translation better conveys the active spiritual power being invoked.

[B] Or: "And thus, may it be Your will, before You, "I Will Be What I Will Be"" — The divine name 'Ehyeh Asher Ehyeh' could be translated more literally as 'I Will Be What I Will Be' rather than using the traditional English rendering 'I Am That I Am.' This alternative preserves the future tense of the Hebrew verb and might better reflect the name's meaning in this context of divine promise and future redemption.

[1] These three Hebrew terms represent different aspects or levels of the soul in Jewish thought. Rather than simply translating them as 'soul,' I've retained the Hebrew terms to preserve the kabbalistic understanding of the soul's multiple components, which is important in the context of deathbed rituals.

[i] This phrase reflects the mystical concept that prayers ascend through specific 'gates' in heaven, with the Thirteen Attributes serving as keys that open these gates of prayer.

[ii] Cf. Yom Kippur Machzor, Al Chet confession — The confession in Ma'avar Yabok adapts the familiar Yom Kippur confession for use at the deathbed, preserving its rhythmic structure while adding mystical dimensions that connect physical sin to spiritual harm across multiple levels of the soul. | Cf. Exodus 34:6-7 — This reference establishes divine mercy as the basis for forgiveness, particularly appropriate in a deathbed context where the person lacks opportunity to demonstrate repentance through future actions. | Cf. Zohar on soul structure — By addressing sins committed through each soul level, this confession incorporates the Zoharic understanding that human actions affect different spiritual realms corresponding to each soul level.

[iii] This is a quotation of the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy from Exodus 34:6-7, a central text in Jewish conceptions of divine forgiveness. According to rabbinic tradition, God taught Moses to recite these attributes as a formula for seeking divine forgiveness. In the context of deathbed confession, invoking these attributes creates a connection to this foundational moment of divine forgiveness.

[iv] This divine name, first revealed to Moses at the burning bush (Exodus 3:14), is one of the most sacred names of God in Jewish tradition. In kabbalistic thought, it represents the highest level of divinity beyond human comprehension. Its use in this confession demonstrates the petition reaching to the highest level of divine mercy available.

[v] Jewish law distinguishes between sins punishable by 'death by the hands of Heaven' (divine punishment) and those punishable by human courts. This distinction forms the organizing principle for this confession, which systematically addresses different categories of sins based on their severity and prescribed punishment.

[A] Or: "For sins for which I am liable to all forms of spiritual cutting-off" — The term 'karet' (כָּרֵת) specifically refers to a divine punishment of being 'cut off' from one's people or from God. While 'excision' is technically accurate, 'spiritual cutting-off' might better convey the theological concept to readers unfamiliar with the technical term.

[B] Or: "and sliding-scale offerings" — The term 'korban oleh v'yored' refers specifically to offerings whose value could be adjusted based on the financial means of the person bringing them. 'Sliding-scale offerings' more precisely conveys this concept than the more general 'variable offerings.'

[C] Or: "For I have caused the divine attributes that should be brought near to become distant, and those that are perfectly united in the supernal realms" — In kabbalistic contexts like this confession, 'those who should be brought near' (הַמְקֻרָבִים) and 'those who are perfectly united above' (יַחְדּוּ תְּמִים לְמַעְלָה) often refer specifically to divine attributes or sefirot rather than people. This alternative translation makes the mystical dimension more explicit.

[i] This phrase reflects kabbalistic concepts about the cosmic impact of human sin. According to Lurianic Kabbalah, human transgressions cause separation between divine attributes (sefirot) that should be united. This confession thus acknowledges not just earthly transgressions but their cosmic impact on divine unity.

[A] Or: "And if I have caused blemish through fleeting thoughts, deliberate contemplation, speech, or action to the first, second, third, or fourth letter of Your great, mighty, and awesome Name" — This alternative more precisely conveys the kabbalistic concept of 'pagam' (blemish/damage) to the divine letters and distinguishes between 'hirhur' (fleeting thought) and 'machshavah' (deliberate contemplation), which have distinct meanings in Jewish mystical tradition.

[1] Jeshurun is a poetic name for Israel found in biblical texts, particularly Deuteronomy. It derives from the Hebrew root meaning 'upright' and is generally understood as an affectionate or honorific term for the Jewish people.

[2] This vivid imagery connects personal suffering and natural death to the four formal death penalties of ancient Jewish courts. In Ma'avar Yabok, deathbed confession transforms ordinary death into sacred atonement through this metaphorical equivalence.

[i] This quotation from Deuteronomy 29:28 acknowledges the limitation of human awareness regarding sin. The confession recognizes that while a person may have consciously confessed known sins, there are unconscious or forgotten transgressions that only God knows. This humility is considered an essential aspect of complete repentance.

[ii] The term 'Jeshurun' is a poetic name for Israel found in Deuteronomy, Isaiah, and elsewhere in biblical literature. Its use here, alongside 'Israel,' creates a parallel structure emphasizing God's relationship with the Jewish people through multiple covenant names.

[iii] Cf. Exodus 34:6-7 — This biblical passage serves as the foundational text for the concept of divine forgiveness in Judaism. In the context of this confession, it reminds the dying person that God's mercy has been established as a covenant promise that can be invoked during times of judgment. | Cf. Deuteronomy 29:28 — The confession cites this verse to acknowledge that while the person has confessed known sins, there are likely unknown sins that only God can see. This humility is an important aspect of complete repentance, recognizing one's limited self-awareness while trusting in God's complete knowledge. | Cf. Yom Kippur liturgy — This deathbed confession adapts the Yom Kippur confession format, suggesting that the moment of death, like Yom Kippur, is understood as a time of judgment and atonement. The parallel implies that proper confession before death can achieve atonement similar to that of Yom Kippur. | Cf. Mishnah Sanhedrin — By referencing these specific punishments from rabbinic legal tradition, the confession acknowledges the seriousness of transgressions against Torah law. In the context of deathbed confession, this recognition of deserved punishment precedes the appeal to divine mercy, following the pattern of 'justice before mercy' in Jewish theological thought. | Cf. Zohar — This kabbalistic language reflects the Zoharic understanding that human sins cause separation in the upper divine worlds. Specifically, transgressions disrupt the proper unification of divine attributes (sefirot), particularly between the masculine and feminine aspects of divinity. This confession thus acknowledges cosmic damage caused by sin, not merely personal wrongdoing.

and Adonut.[B] May they all shine together in the worlds of Atzilut, Beriah, Yetzirah, and Asiyah,[1] as befits the King without hindrance. Together may they be complete—the attribute of night within day

[A] Or: "And may my pain and bodily sufferings, together with the offering of my soul at its departure from me" — This alternative renders 'korban nishmati' as 'offering of my soul' rather than 'sacrifice of my soul,' which may better reflect the concept that the soul itself is being presented as a sacred offering rather than being destroyed, and treats the departure of the soul as a sacred ritual act similar to Temple offerings.

[B] Or: "And You, in Your abundant mercy, restore and effect the unification upon me of each of the four letters of each of Your three precious Names: YHVH, Ehyeh, and Adonut" — This alternative better conveys the kabbalistic concept of 'yichud' (unification) as an active cosmic process rather than a simple joining, and treats 'tashuv' as 'restore' rather than literally 'return,' which better captures the theological concept of divine restoration of cosmic harmony.

[1] These four worlds represent decreasing levels of spirituality in kabbalistic cosmology: Atzilut (Emanation) is pure divinity, Beriah (Creation) is where souls originate, Yetzirah (Formation) is where angels dwell, and Asiyah (Action) includes the physical world we inhabit.

[i] This three-part epithet ('great, mighty, and awesome') for God's name comes from the biblical verse Deuteronomy 10:17 and appears in the standard Amidah prayer. In kabbalistic thought, causing 'damage' to divine names through sin creates cosmic disruption that confession aims to repair.

[ii] The 'four death penalties' refer to the four methods of capital punishment administered by the ancient Jewish high court (Sanhedrin): stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling. In kabbalistic tradition, different sins damage different letters of God's name, making one liable to these punishments. This confession transforms natural death into spiritual atonement by comparing it to these judicial punishments.

[iii] The concept of 'unifying' (yichud) divine letters and names is central to kabbalistic practice. Sin is understood to cause separation or damage to divine names, while proper intention, prayer, and confession restore their unity and proper flow through all spiritual worlds.

[iv] These are three divine names: YHVH (the Tetragrammaton), Ehyeh ("I will be," from Exodus 3:14), and Adonut (from the name Adonai, "my Lord"). In kabbalah, each name represents different aspects of divine manifestation and governance. Each is treated as having four letters, with specific cosmic significance.

and the attribute of day within night[1]—and "You shall join the tent together so it becomes one." May desire flow forth from the Crown of Mercy through the pathways of thought, and grant me understanding of Your greatness and might, that I may glory in the eternal splendor of Your majesty and be established in Your kingdom. And if I need water to ascend from impurity to purity, may living waters flow from the expanses of the river to the middle line, from Jachin to Boaz,[2] "a river whose streams make glad," and "a fountain shall go forth from the house of the LORD," and in it I will immerse and be purified, and circumcise the foreskin of my heart,[3] and no longer act defiantly. And You, in Your abundant mercy, be my help and give me strength to act valiantly, and remove from me the impurity of my evil inclination.[4]

[1]This reflects the kabbalistic principle of cosmic balance between opposing forces. 'Night' typically represents divine judgment/severity while 'day' represents mercy/kindness. Their integration creates cosmic harmony.

[2]These were the names of the two pillars flanking the entrance to Solomon's Temple. In kabbalistic symbolism, they represent the right and left columns of the sefirotic tree—the pillars of mercy and judgment that must be balanced through the central column.

[3]This biblical metaphor from Deuteronomy represents the removal of spiritual obstinacy and resistance to divine will. In this deathbed context, it expresses the desire for complete spiritual surrender and purification before death.

[4]The 'evil inclination' (yetzer ha-ra) in Jewish thought is not inherently evil but represents self-centered desires that can lead to sin when not properly channeled. This confession seeks purification from its negative aspects before death.

[i]These are the four spiritual worlds in kabbalistic cosmology: Atzilut (Emanation), Beriah (Creation), Yetzirah (Formation), and Asiyah (Action), arranged in descending order from the most spiritual to the most material. The prayer seeks divine illumination through all levels of reality.

[ii]This is a direct quote from Exodus 26:11 regarding the construction of the Tabernacle. In this context, it becomes a metaphor for cosmic unification—the joining of 'night' and 'day' attributes (likely referring to judgment and mercy) into perfect divine harmony.

[iii]This passage uses terminology from the lower sefirot (divine attributes): Netzach (Eternity/Victory), Hod (Splendor), and Malkhut (Kingdom). The supplicant seeks integration with these divine qualities through proper confession.

[iv]Jachin and Boaz were the names of the two pillars at the entrance to Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 7:21). In kabbalistic symbolism, they represent the masculine and feminine cosmic principles, or the pillars of mercy and judgment on the Tree of Life diagram.

[v]This metaphor of 'circumcising the heart' comes from Deuteronomy 10:16, where it represents removing spiritual obstinacy. In this confession, it expresses the desire for complete spiritual purification and surrender to divine will at the moment of death.

[vi]Cf. Zohar — This confession draws on Zoharic concepts about how human sin damages divine Names and how proper confession can repair these damages, allowing the divine letters to be reunified and shine properly through all four spiritual worlds. | Cf. Four death penalties of the Sanhedrin — The confession employs these four death penalties metaphorically, suggesting that the confessor's suffering and approaching death should be accepted as atonement equivalent to these judicial punishments, transforming natural death into a sacred act of atonement. | Cf. O Master of Kindness, judge me with patience and forbearance. Please do not take me from this world hastily, until I have chosen a fine portion and dwelling for my pure soul in the chambers of light.[A] From balsam oil and the dew of Hermon, increase my portion, and for life in the World to Come, grant me an unlimited share, an inheritance without boundaries. Please command Your holy angels who are appointed over the Torah[B] to enlighten my eyes in Scripture, Mishnah, Talmud, halakhot, aggadot, the secrets of Torah, its statutes, and its judgments. Open my heart and my innermost being[1] to understand and heed Your precepts and to observe Your commandments. Grant me merit to learn and to teach, to understand and to instruct, to observe and to practice, from now until eternity. Increase my territory with students in this world

[A] Or: "a beautiful portion and abode for the pure soul in the luminous chambers" — This alternate translation is more poetic and captures the aesthetic quality implied by 'yafah' (beautiful rather than merely 'fine'). 'Abode' might better convey the sense of permanent residence implied by 'mador' than 'dwelling', and 'luminous chambers' has a more mystical resonance that fits the context.

[B] Or: "Please instruct Your holy angels who are custodians of the Torah" — The term 'memunnim' implies guardianship and oversight rather than merely being 'appointed'. 'Custodians' better captures the active role these angels play in preserving and transmitting Torah knowledge in kabbalistic thought.

[1] The Hebrew uses 'heart and kidneys' (libi v'kilyotai), reflecting the biblical conception of kidneys as the seat of deep emotions and inner thoughts.

26:11 — The biblical verse about joining the Tabernacle is repurposed here as a mystical metaphor for the unification of divine attributes and cosmic harmony that the confessor hopes to achieve through proper deathbed confession. | Cf. Joel 4:18 — This prophetic verse is reinterpreted in the confession as a personal prayer for spiritual purification, where the eschatological fountain becomes a metaphorical mikveh (ritual bath) for the soul's cleansing before its final journey. | Cf. Deuteronomy 10:16 — The metaphor of heart circumcision represents the removal of spiritual barriers and obstinacy, expressing the confessor's desire for complete spiritual transformation and openness to divine influence at the moment of death. | Cf. Kabbalistic doctrine of the Four Worlds — The confession seeks to repair damage caused by sin across all four spiritual worlds, reflecting the kabbalistic understanding that human actions affect the entire cosmic structure from the highest divine realms to the physical world.

[i] The prayer begins by addressing God as 'Master of Kindness' and requesting judgment with patience. The phrase 'orekh apayim' (literally 'long of nostrils/face') is a traditional attribute of divine mercy, referring to God's patience before expressing anger.

[ii] This refers to the kabbalistic concept that one's actions in this world determine the 'portion' (manah) and 'dwelling' (mador) that their soul will inhabit in the afterlife.

[iii] These are metaphors for divine abundance. Balsam oil was highly valued in ancient times, and the dew of Mount Hermon is referenced in Psalm 133 as a symbol of blessing.

[iv] A reference to the Talmudic concept of 'nachalah bli metzarim' (inheritance without boundaries), describing the unlimited spiritual reward in the World to Come.

[v] In Jewish mystical thought, different angels are appointed over various aspects of Torah study and spiritual wisdom.

[vi] In biblical Hebrew, the kidneys (kelayot) were considered the seat of emotion and inner thoughts, similar to how we refer to the heart today.

May I merit to stroll in the delight of Your courts and to see the goodness of Your chosen ones, to stand and [A] Or: "May I proceed by the illumination of the pure soul toward the presence of the divine candelabrum" — This alternative better conveys the mystical significance of the menorah as more than just a physical object but a divine symbol of enlightenment. 'Proceed' captures the spiritual journey implied, and 'illumination' connects more directly with the light metaphor prevalent throughout the prayer.

[B] Or: "Before my soul departs from my body, may my Torah learning be systematically arranged and flowing readily from my lips" — This translation better captures the technical terms 'sadur' and 'shagur' which specifically refer to having one's learning organized in memory and readily accessible for recitation. The prayer expresses the wish to have full command of one's Torah knowledge at the moment of death, when one must 'give an account' in the heavenly court.

[1] This poetic expression comes from Proverbs 4:25, referring to moral clarity and spiritual focus. The straightened eyelids represent looking directly toward divine truth without distraction.

[2] This passage reflects the kabbalistic concept of the three-part soul: neshamah (highest spiritual level), nefesh (vital soul), and ruach (spirit/middle level). Each connects with divinity in a different way: unification, glorification, and seeking.

[3] This refers to the rabbinic concept that the righteous merit reward in both this world and the World to Come, with the two harmoniously integrated rather than in conflict.

[i] This formulaic sequence appears in traditional Jewish liturgy, particularly in blessings over Torah study, emphasizing the progression from learning to teaching to practicing.

[ii] This passage refers to the three levels of the soul in Kabbalah: neshamah (highest), ruach (middle), and nefesh (vital soul), each engaging with divinity in a different way.

[iii] The menorah symbolizes divine light and wisdom. This passage expresses the hope that the soul's inherent purity will guide one toward spiritual illumination.

[iv] Based on Isaiah 61:10, this imagery of being clothed in salvation and wrapped in righteousness represents spiritual protection and divine favor.

[v] This refers to the Jewish concept that the righteous inherit both this world and the World to Come, enjoying them in perfect harmony.

[vi] Traditional Jewish teaching emphasized that one's learning should be 'arranged and fluent in one's mouth' so that when appearing before the heavenly court, one can properly account for their Torah knowledge.

[vii] In Kabbalistic thought, the unification of God's name refers to the mystical process of restoring cosmic harmony through proper spiritual intention and action.

[A] Or: "And there, may the pure soul You placed within me be gathered into the treasury of eternal life" — The Hebrew 'tzeror ha-chayyim' (literally 'bundle of life') has traditionally been translated as 'bond of life,' but the metaphor actually suggests a treasury or repository where precious items are kept safe. This alternate translation preserves both the imagery of being 'gathered in' (tzrurah) and the concept of safekeeping implied in the original Hebrew metaphor.

[1] The Hebrew terms 'hod' and 'netzach' refer both to Jerusalem's glory and to specific divine attributes (sefirot) in Kabbalah, connecting the physical Jerusalem with its spiritual counterpart.
[2] The prayer acknowledges death ('depart') but frames it positively as a loving transition rather than a fearful event, consistent with Ma'avar Yabok's approach to death as a spiritual crossing.

[i] This combines messianic hope for the restoration of Jerusalem with kabbalistic references to the divine attributes of Hod (splendor) and Netzach (victory/eternity).
[ii] This poetic phrasing describes mystical divine love using the metaphor of clinging flame, a common image in Jewish mystical literature.
[iii] The phrase 'bound in the bond of life' (tzeror ha-chayyim) comes from I Samuel 25:29 and became a traditional expression in Jewish mourning, appearing on gravestones and in memorial prayers. Here it expresses hope for the soul's eternal connection to divine life.
[iv] Cf. Psalm 133:3 — The prayer uses this biblical image of the dew of Hermon to represent divine abundance and blessing that the supplicant hopes will increase their spiritual portion. In Psalm 133, this dew is described as descending on Zion as a symbol of harmony and divine favor. | Cf. Isaiah 61:10 — The prayer's phrases 'clothe me in garments of salvation' and 'crown me with the veil of righteousness' directly echo Isaiah's imagery, expressing hope for divine protection and favor. These garments symbolize spiritual transformation and divine acceptance. | Cf. I Samuel 25:29 — The concluding phrase of the prayer, 'bound in the bond of life,' comes directly from this biblical source. What began as a blessing for the living in Samuel became a traditional expression in Jewish mourning liturgy for the soul's eternal connection to God after death. Its use in this prayer shows how Ma'avar Yabok integrates biblical language into its deathbed liturgy. | Cf. Midrash Tanchuma, Pekudei 3 — The prayer's reference to 'angels appointed over the Torah' reflects rabbinic and mystical traditions that specific angels oversee different domains of knowledge. In kabbalistic thought, these angels assist humans in accessing divine wisdom, which explains why the supplicant asks God to command these angels to enlighten their understanding. | Cf. Zohar III:245a — The prayer's tripartite structure of 'my neshamah will unify You, my nefesh glorify You, and my ruach seek Your name' parallels Zoharic teachings about how each soul level connects with divinity in its unique way. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's deep engagement with kabbalistic concepts, particularly regarding the soul's journey after death. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Berakhot 17a — This prayer echoes traditional rabbinic prayers for Torah study, particularly in its request for understanding Scripture, Mishnah, Talmud, and other aspects of Jewish learning. The structure and language suggest it follows established patterns of rabbinic supplication, adapted for the context of preparing for death.

[A] Or: "Set Your attributes in motion" — The Hebrew verb 'תְּגַלְגֵּל' conveys the image of rolling or turning like a wheel. While 'roll forth' captures the literal meaning, 'set in motion' might better convey the functional meaning of activating or implementing God's merciful attributes.

[B] Or: "open and strengthen the deliverance that is our share" — The Hebrew 'סְעַד' has connotations of supporting, strengthening, or sustaining, while 'יֶשַׁע' can be translated as 'salvation' or 'deliverance.' Similarly, 'מָנָתְךָ' can be understood as 'our portion' or 'our share.' This alternate translation offers slightly different nuances that might better capture the intended meaning in certain contexts.

[C] Or: "Attend to those who understand Your divine meetings" — The term 'וְעוּדֶיךָ' has connotations beyond just 'appointed times' and can refer to meetings, assemblies, or encounters with the divine. This alternate translation emphasizes the relational aspect rather than just the temporal one.

[1] The opening lines follow a poetic structure with many phrases beginning with different Hebrew letters, creating a semi-acrostic pattern that is difficult to preserve in translation.

[2] The reference to God's 'encampments' (מַחֲנוֹתֶיךָ) may have dual significance: referring to both the earthly Jewish communities and heavenly angelic hosts, with the prayer asking for unity between these realms.

[3] This line connects to messianic concepts in Jewish tradition, where the full revelation of divine kingship is associated with the ultimate redemption and cosmic joy.

[4] The original Hebrew uses the phrases 'נוֹשֵׂא עָוֹן' (literally 'bearing iniquity') and 'עוֹבֵר עַל פֶּשַׁע' (literally 'passing over transgression'), which are technical terms from the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy in Exodus 34:6-7.

[i] The Hebrew term 'מְחִילָתֶךָ' (Your forgiveness) is related to the word 'מְחִילָה' (mechilah), which in Jewish tradition refers to the complete wiping away of sin rather than merely pardoning it.

[ii] The phrase 'roll forth Your attributes' uses the verb 'תְּגַלְגֵּל' (from the root meaning 'to roll') with 'מִדּוֹתֶיךָ' (Your attributes), referring to God's Thirteen Attributes of Mercy. The imagery suggests setting these attributes in motion like a wheel to activate divine compassion.

[iii] The term 'וְעוּדֶיךָ' (Your appointed times) may refer to those who know the proper times for prayer according to Jewish tradition, or alternatively, those who understand God's appointed festivals or cosmic cycles.

[iv] The phrase 'support together Your encampments' likely refers to the kabbalistic concept of divine encampments or hosts, potentially connecting to the biblical concept of 'Mahanaim' (two camps) mentioned elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok as significant at the time of death.

[v] The request for God to 'look down and behold Your Divine Presence' reflects the kabbalistic concept that the Shekhinah (Divine Presence) can become separated or distanced from the higher aspects of divinity, requiring divine attention and reunification.

[A] Or: "He should focus his mystical meditation on the Thirteen Attributes of the Divine Countenance" — This alternative translation avoids the technical kabbalistic term 'Arich Anpin' in favor of a more accessible English phrase, which might be preferable for readers without background in Kabbalah. However, it loses the specificity of the kabbalistic concept being referenced.

[B] Or: "following the method detailed in Pardes Rimmonim" — This alternative explicitly names the full title of the book being referenced (Pardes Rimmonim by Moses Cordovero) rather than using the abbreviated form. This provides more clarity but is slightly less faithful to the exact wording of the original text.

[1] The prayer concludes with a reference to God's ancient covenant promises to the patriarchs, connecting the immediate request for forgiveness with the long historical relationship between God and Israel.

[i] Cf. Micah 7:18-20 — These verses from Micah are frequently used in Jewish liturgy related to forgiveness and divine mercy, particularly during the Ten Days of Repentance between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Their inclusion here connects this prayer to established penitential traditions. | Cf. Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (Exodus 34:6-7) — The phrase 'תְּגַלְגֵּל מִדּוֹתֶיךָ' (Roll forth Your attributes) alludes to the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy revealed to Moses after the sin of the Golden Calf, which became a central formula in Jewish penitential prayers. | Cf. Psalm 69:14 — The direct quote from Psalm 69:14 'וַאֲנִי תְפִלָּתִי לְךָ יְיָ עֵת רָצוֹן' is frequently used in Jewish liturgy to introduce personal supplications, expressing hope that the prayer is being offered at a time of divine receptivity. | Cf. Psalm 150:6 — The quote 'כֹּל הַנְּשָׁמָה תְּהַלֵּל יָהּ הַלְלוּיָהּ' comes from the final verse of Psalm 150, which concludes the entire Book of Psalms. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this reference to all souls praising God creates a connection between individual supplication and universal praise. | Cf. 1 Chronicles 16:31 — The line 'יִשְׂמְחוּ הַשָּׁמַיִם וְתָגֵל הָאָרֶץ' echoes 1 Chronicles 16:31 from David's song of thanksgiving when the Ark was brought to Jerusalem. In this context, it expresses hope for divine revelation and redemption.

[ii] This refers to the Thirteen Attributes of Arich Anpin (the Long-Faced One), a kabbalistic concept referring to a divine configuration within the highest levels of the sefirotic system. Unlike the better-known Thirteen Attributes of Mercy mentioned in Exodus 34:6-7, these attributes are specifically associated with Arich Anpin, which represents a higher and more concealed aspect of divinity in Lurianic Kabbalah.

[iii] This refers to "Pardes Rimmonim" (Orchard of Pomegranates), an influential kabbalistic work by Rabbi Moses Cordovero (1522-1570), which systematically presents kabbalistic teachings. The instruction indicates that the practitioner should focus their intention according to the specific method outlined in this text.

[iv] Cf. Pardes Rimmonim by Moses Cordovero — This reference to Pardes Rimmonim indicates that the dying person should concentrate on a specific kabbalistic meditation detailed in Cordovero's work. This advanced mystical practice was believed to facilitate the soul's ascent through higher divine realms and connection to the highest sources of divine mercy as the person approached death. | Cf. Zohar — The concept of Arich Anpin and its thirteen attributes originates in the Zohar's Idra Rabba section, which explores the structure of divine emanation in great detail. By referring to these attributes, Ma'avar Yabok is connecting deathbed practices to the highest and most esoteric aspects of kabbalistic cosmology.

[A] Or: "purify through Your great compassion" — The Hebrew מָרוֹק (m'rok) carries connotations of polishing or scouring clean, which might be better conveyed by 'purify' in some contexts. 'Compassion' is also a valid alternative to 'mercy' for רַחֲמֶיךָ.

[B] Or: "Cast them into the ocean depths" — While the original translation is more explicit by adding 'my sins' (which is implied but not explicit in the Hebrew), this alternate preserves the more poetic, concise style of the original with the pronoun 'them' referring back to sins.

[C] Or: "to a place where they will neither be remembered, nor counted against me, nor come to mind" — The term יִפָּקְדוּ has connotations of being counted or visited for judgment, which 'counted against me' captures more explicitly. 'Come to mind' is a more natural English expression for the Hebrew idiom 'rise up in heart.'

[D] Or: "three times" — The abbreviation ג״פ (gimmel-peh) simply means 'three times' and doesn't necessarily require the explanatory brackets with 'recite,' though they are helpful for clarity in a prayer context.

[1] The phrase 'from now until eternity' (מֵעַתָּה וְעַד עוֹלָם) appears frequently in biblical and liturgical Hebrew, emphasizing the permanent nature of the forgiveness being requested.

[2] This is a quote from Psalm 19:15 that appears in many Jewish prayers, particularly at the conclusion of the Amidah (standing prayer). Its inclusion here shows how this confession follows traditional liturgical patterns.

[3] This closing formula appears in the Kaddish prayer and at the end of the Amidah. Its inclusion

[i] The Hebrew term מָרוֹק (m'rok) implies a thorough cleansing or polishing, suggesting complete purification rather than merely covering or overlooking sins.

[ii] This phrase is significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, as it acknowledges suffering and illness as potential means of atonement while specifically requesting forgiveness without such difficult paths. This reflects the Jewish theological understanding that suffering can have spiritual purpose while still being something one naturally hopes to avoid.

[iii] This metaphor draws on Micah 7:19, which promises that God will cast all sins into the depths of the sea. This imagery suggests complete and permanent forgiveness, as something thrown into ocean depths is irretrievable.

[iv] The phrase 'rise up in the heart' (יַעֲלוּ עַל לֵב) is a Hebrew idiom for remembering or coming to mind. The prayer asks not only for forgiveness but for the complete erasure of sins from memory.

[v] This is an abbreviation for 'gimmel pe'amim' (three times), indicating that the preceding verse should be recited three times. The practice of triple recitation often appears in Jewish prayers and has mystical significance, with the number three representing emphasis and completion.

[vi] Cf. Psalms 19:15 — This verse serves as a formal conclusion to prayers in Jewish liturgy, asking that one's words and thoughts be acceptable to God. Its inclusion here shows how the prayer follows traditional Jewish liturgical patterns even in this specialized context of confession and healing. | Cf. Psalms 78:38 — This verse emphasizes God's merciful nature and willingness to forgive sins repeatedly, making it particularly appropriate in a confessional prayer seeking divine forgiveness. It affirms that God's essential nature is to be compassionate rather than destructive. | Cf. Micah 7:19 — This allusion to Micah strengthens the prayer's appeal by reminding God us and upon all Israel. Amen.

And those standing by him shall seek mercy for him[B] while completing the psalm, and this should be done three times:[C] He will not allow your foot to slip; your guardian will not slumber.[3] Behold, the Guardian of Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps. The LORD is your guardian; the LORD is your shade[4] at your right hand. The sun will not harm you by day, nor the moon by night. The LORD will protect you from all evil; He will guard your soul.[D] The LORD

[A] Or: "A Song of the Steps" — The Hebrew term 'ma'alot' literally means 'steps' or 'ascents.' This alternate translation emphasizes the physical imagery of ascending steps, which some scholars believe referred to the fifteen steps of the Temple where these psalms may have been sung by Levites.

[B] Or: "And those attending him shall pray for mercy on his behalf" — This translation more explicitly conveys the caregiving relationship and the intercessory nature of the prayer, making clearer that this is an instruction for those caring for the sick person.

[C] Or: "and they should do so three times" — This alternative more clearly indicates that the instruction refers to the attendants (plural) performing the recitation three times, rather than potentially suggesting that the sick person should recite it.

[D] Or: "The LORD will protect you from all harm; He will preserve your life-force" — This translation captures the concrete Hebrew meaning of 'nefesh' as the vital life-force or breath of life, which in the context of illness refers to protection of physical vitality, not just the spiritual soul.

here ties this confession to the broader framework of Jewish liturgy.

[1] This is a liturgical instruction directing caregivers to involve the ill person in prayer, rather than merely reciting prayers on their behalf. This reflects the Jewish value of including the ill person as an active participant in their spiritual care whenever possible. The prayers that would follow this instruction (not shown in this segment) would typically include psalms and biblical verses with healing themes.

[2] This opening image of looking upward toward the mountains establishes a visual metaphor for seeking divine help from above, particularly appropriate for someone who is bedridden and physically looking up.

[3] The Hebrew uses the active participle 'shomrekha' (your guardian/keeper), emphasizing God's constant vigilance and protective presence, which would be especially comforting to the ill.

[4] The metaphor of God as 'shade' or 'shadow' (tzel) is significant in Jewish mystical tradition, often referring to divine protection. This connects to Ma'avar Yabok's recurring motif of souls finding refuge 'under the shadow of God's wings.'

of His own promise to completely remove sins. The metaphor of casting sins into the sea represents complete and permanent forgiveness, as something thrown into the ocean depths is irretrievable and forgotten. | Cf. Job 11:16 — This echo connects to Job's theme of forgetting past troubles completely. In the prayer, the supplicant asks not only for forgiveness but for complete erasure of sins from memory and record, suggesting that true healing involves not just forgiveness but a complete fresh start without the burden of past failures.

[i] This brief instruction appears in Ma'avar Yabok as part of the structured ritual for the sick and dying. It directs the caregiver (likely a member of the chevra kadisha or burial society) to recite the prayers that follow together with the ill person, rather than on their behalf. This indicates a shift from prayers said for the sick person to prayers recited jointly, which was considered spiritually more powerful.

Who is a God like You,[2] who pardons iniquity and overlooks transgression for the remnant of His heritage? He does not maintain His anger forever, for He desires kindness. He will again have compassion on us, He will subdue our iniquities, and You will cast all their sins into the depths of the sea. You will give truth to Jacob, kindness to Abraham, as You swore to our forefathers from ancient times. Into Your hand I entrust my spirit; You have redeemed me, O LORD, God of truth. Discipline me, O LORD, but with justice; not in Your anger, lest You diminish me.[A] You will rest in goodness and awaken with mercy.[B] O God, please heal me. Heal me, O LORD,

[A] Or: "Chastise me, LORD, but with justice; not in Your anger, lest You reduce me to nothing." — This alternate translation emphasizes the potential severity of divine anger with stronger language ("chastise" instead of "discipline" and "reduce me to nothing" instead of "diminish me"). This might better convey the gravity of the plea in contexts where the sick person is experiencing severe suffering interpreted as divine judgment.

[B] Or: "May your night be spent in goodness and your awakening be with mercy." — This alternate translation renders the verse as a blessing or wish rather than a statement of fact, which might be more appropriate in the context of a prayer for the sick. It also makes more explicit the metaphor of night and morning (sleeping and awakening) that is implied in the Hebrew.

[1] This brief liturgical direction indicates a transition to prayers that should be recited following the death of the individual. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, such instructions create a structured sequence of prayers for different stages in the process of death and mourning.

[2] This prayer begins with verses from Micah 7:18-20, which emphasize God's forgiving nature. This opening establishes the theological framework for the healing prayer that follows, grounding the request for healing in God's established character as merciful and compassionate.

[i] Cf. Psalm 91 — Both Psalms 91 and 121 focus on divine protection and are prescribed in Ma'avar Yabok for recitation in cases of illness. Their parallel structure of describing God as protector and guardian makes them complementary texts in deathbed rituals. | Cf. Zohar — The instruction to recite this psalm three times reflects kabbalistic practices influenced by the Zohar, which often prescribes triple repetition of prayers to activate divine protection across the three columns of the sefirotic tree. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The psalm's final verse about 'going out and coming in' connects to Ma'avar Yabok's guidelines for visitors to the sick, who should offer prayers of protection when arriving and departing, creating spiritual boundaries around the ill person. | Cf. Genesis 32 — The psalm's imagery of divine protection during journeys ('going out and coming in') resonates with the book's central metaphor of the soul's journey across the Yabok/Jabbok as a transition protected by God.

[ii] This is a standard liturgical instruction in Ma'avar Yabok that marks transitions between different prayer components in the structured sequences for healing the sick and comforting the dying. This particular instruction appears to indicate what should be recited after death has occurred.

[iii] This phrase from Micah 7:18 describes God's dual approach to sin: "pardoning iniquity" (actively lifting it away) and "passing over transgression" (choosing not to focus on it). These different expressions reflect the kabbalistic understanding of how God addresses different types of spiritual blemishes.

[1]The instruction to repeat this verse three times reflects the Jewish mystical practice of triple recitation for verses considered particularly powerful for healing. This verse from Jeremiah 17:14 is considered one of the most effective biblical healing formulas.

[2]This section presents an Aramaic translation of the preceding Hebrew phrases, creating a sixfold repetition of the same concept with different word orders. In kabbalistic practice, rearranging the words of sacred verses is believed to access different channels of divine energy for healing and protection.

[3]This is the Priestly Blessing (Birkat Kohanim) from Numbers 6:24-26, the most sacred formulaic blessing in Jewish tradition. Its inclusion at the conclusion of healing prayers invokes divine protection, grace, and peace upon the sick person.

[4]This concluding verse from Psalm 19:15 is a standard closing formula in Jewish prayers. In

[i]This abbreviation stands for "three times" (גימל פעמים/gimmel pe'amim), indicating that the preceding verse should be recited three times. The threefold repetition of sacred verses is a common practice in Jewish prayers for the sick, believed to amplify their spiritual power.

[ii]This is an Aramaic translation of the Hebrew "For Your salvation I hope, O LORD" (לישועתך קויתי יי). The prayer includes both Hebrew and Aramaic versions of the same phrase, reflecting the bilingual nature of Jewish liturgical tradition and the kabbalistic belief that reciting sacred phrases in multiple languages increases their spiritual efficacy.

[iii]Cf. Micah 7:18-20 — These opening verses establish a foundation of divine mercy and forgiveness, setting a reassuring tone for this prayer recited for the sick or dying person. The text emphasizes God's compassion and willingness to cast away sins completely. | Cf. Psalm 31:6 — This verse is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok as it is recommended to be recited at the moment of death as an expression of the soul's surrender to divine care, following the tradition that these were the final words of Jesus and other Jewish martyrs. | Cf. Jeremiah 10:24 — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse acknowledges that illness may serve as divine correction while simultaneously appealing for that correction to be administered with mercy and restraint. | Cf. Numbers 12:13 — This concise healing prayer is considered one of the most direct and effective biblical healing formulas, making it particularly appropriate in this context of praying for the sick. | Cf. Jeremiah 17:14 — The instruction to repeat this verse three times (indicated by ג״פ) reflects the belief in the amplified spiritual power of threefold repetition, particularly for verses with special healing properties. | Cf. Genesis 49:18 — This verse is recited in three different word orders (in both Hebrew and Aramaic), creating a total of six variations. This practice reflects kabbalistic belief that rearranging the words of sacred verses can activate different channels of divine energy for healing and protection. | Cf. Numbers 6:24-26 — The inclusion of the Priestly Blessing at the conclusion of this healing prayer invokes the threefold divine blessing of protection, grace, and peace upon the sick person, calling upon the highest form of ritualized blessing in Jewish tradition. | Cf. Psalm 19:15 — This familiar liturgical formula serves as a closing for the prayer, embodying the hope that all the preceding prayers will be accepted by God. It's particularly significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, where proper words and intentions are considered crucial for effective spiritual intervention.

כוונת קצת פסוקים אלו הם בפרק י״ט מאמר א׳.[i]

The intentions of some of these verses are found in Chapter 19 of Discourse One.

והמודה אותו יעשה לו התרת קללות.[ii] ויברכהו כדדרש רמי בר חמא בב״ב פ״ח[iii] על פסוק חמת מלך מלאכי מות ואיש חכם יכפרנה. ואם ירצה החולה לומר אל מלך ובפרט אם הוא ת״ח מתוקן ומקובל[iv] יאמר תחלה אתאנו על שמך.[v] ויש שלמים וכן רבים מקרין אותו אדון עולם[vi] עד סופו. ויש מקריו אותו יגדל[vii] ומפרשים לו כל אחד מי״ג עקרים[viii] אם צריך הוא לכך והחולה יודה

And the one who helps the sick person confess[A] should perform for him an annulment of curses,[1] and should bless him as Rami bar Chama expounded in Bava Batra 8b on the verse "The king's wrath is like messengers of death, but a wise man will appease it."[2] And if the sick person wishes to recite "El Melech"[3] (God the King), especially if he is a Torah scholar of refined character and respected status, he should first say "We have come upon Your name." There are pious individuals and indeed many who have the sick person recite "Adon Olam" (Master of the Universe) to its conclusion. And some have him recite "Yigdal" and explain to him each of [A] Or: "And the one who guides his confession" — This is a more literal translation of the Hebrew, though less explicit about the sick person being the subject. The original translation clarifies the context, which is important for understanding.

Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as the designated ending for each of the eight prayer sequences (sedarim) in the Seder section, marking the completion of a structured healing prayer.

[1] "Hatarat kelalot" is a ritual to annul or release someone from possible curses. This reflects the belief that illness might be connected to unresolved curses that should be addressed as part of spiritual healing.

[2] This verse from Proverbs 16:14 is interpreted in the Talmudic passage to suggest that a wise person can appease divine wrath through blessing. In this context, it implies that blessing the sick person may help alleviate divine judgment manifesting as illness.

[3] This likely refers to the prayer "El Melech Yoshev" (God, King who sits upon a throne of mercy), a penitential prayer emphasizing God's merciful attributes, which would be appropriate for someone who is ill and seeking divine compassion.

[i] This reference indicates that explanations for the proper mystical intentions (kavvanot) for reciting these verses can be found elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok. Such cross-references are common in the work, creating an interconnected system where practical instructions in one section are supported by deeper mystical explanations in another.

[ii] This refers to the person who is helping the sick individual recite their confession (vidui). The helper should perform a ritual annulment of any curses that might be affecting the sick person, as part of the deathbed preparation.

[iii] This refers to a teaching from the Talmud, Tractate Bava Batra, page 8b, where Rami bar Chama interprets the verse from Proverbs 16:14.

[iv] A Torah scholar (talmid chacham) who is 'refined' in character and 'accepted/respected' in the community. This indicates that learned individuals might have different prayer customs than ordinary people.

[v] "We have come upon Your name"—the opening words of a liturgical poem often recited as part of penitential prayers.

[vi] "Adon Olam" is a well-known Jewish hymn expressing God's eternal nature and sovereignty, often recited at the beginning of morning prayers and at the conclusion of Sabbath and holiday services.

[vii] "Yigdal" is a hymn based on Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Faith, poetically expressing fundamental Jewish beliefs.

[viii] The Thirteen Principles of Faith formulated by Maimonides, considered fundamental beliefs of Judaism including the existence of God, divine unity, prophecy, and resurrection of the dead.

בפיו ובלבבו על כל אחד מהם והכל לפי ישוב דעתו של חולה וטוב מעט בכוונה מהרבות שלא בכוונה:[i] [ii]

the Thirteen Principles of Faith[1] if he needs this, and the sick person should acknowledge with his mouth and his heart each one of them. If, God forbid, the hour is pressing for him,[3] he should raise his ten fingers upward[B] and focus his intention on the unification of the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Divine Presence,[C] contemplating the Cause of all causes and the Prime Mover who gives 2635R

[A] Or: "Everything should be according to the composure and clarity of mind of the sick person" — This alternate translation captures more of the nuance of "yishuv da'ato," which refers not just to mental state but to presence of mind, composure, and clarity of thought.

[B] Or: "he should lift all ten fingers toward heaven" — This alternative translation emphasizes the directional aspect (toward heaven) more explicitly, which better captures the spiritual symbolism of the gesture.

[C] Or: "direct his concentration toward the unification of the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Shekhinah" — Using the untranslated term 'Shekhinah' might better preserve the kabbalistic terminology, as it specifically refers to the feminine divine presence in Jewish mysticism.

[1] These principles, formulated by Maimonides (1135-1204), became fundamental articles of Jewish belief. Having a sick person affirm these beliefs was considered spiritually beneficial, especially when facing possible death, as it would ensure they died with correct theological understanding.

[2] The Hebrew term "kavanah" (intention) refers to mental concentration and spiritual focus during prayer. This statement reflects the Jewish principle that quality of devotion is more important than quantity, especially for someone who is ill and may have limited strength.

[3] This refers to when death appears imminent and there is no time for the full confession ritual.

[i] This reflects a common rabbinic principle that quality of prayer (with proper intention/kavvanah) is more important than quantity, especially for someone who is ill and may have limited strength or concentration.

[ii] Cf. Talmud, Bava Batra 8b — The Talmudic passage interprets the verse "The king's wrath is like messengers of death, but a wise man will appease it" to suggest that blessing someone can mitigate divine judgment. Ma'avar Yabok applies this to the context of blessing the sick during deathbed rituals. | Cf. Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Faith — The text recommends having the dying person affirm these core theological principles, ensuring they die with correct beliefs. This reflects the importance of proper theological understanding at the moment of death in Jewish tradition. | Cf. Adon Olam prayer — This hymn, which emphasizes God's eternal sovereignty, was considered particularly appropriate for deathbed recitation as it affirms divine power over life and death and expresses complete trust in God. | Cf. Yigdal prayer — This poetic rendition of Maimonides' principles was recommended for deathbed recitation as a way of affirming fundamental Jewish beliefs in a structured, familiar form that would be comforting to the dying person.

[iii] This is an abbreviation for "bar minan" (far be it from us), a euphemistic expression used when referring to death or serious illness.

[iv] The raising of ten fingers symbolizes complete surrender and connection to the divine. The ten fingers correspond to the ten sefirot (divine emanations) in Kabbalah.

[v] This refers to the mystical unification of the masculine and feminine aspects of divinity, a central concept in Kabbalah. This unification is considered particularly important at the moment of death, as it helps the soul's transition.

[vi] These are philosophical terms describing God as the "Cause of causes" and the "Prime Mover" or "Supreme Cause," combining kabbalistic terminology with Aristotelian philosophical concepts.

[ii] הכל בסוד עליית נשמתו[i] ויאמר: like to all,[1] through the mystery of his soul's ascent, and he should say: 2640R

2470 יְהִי רָצוֹן מִלְּפָנֶיךָ שֶׁיִּהְיֶה שָׁלוֹם מְנוּחָתִי: [iii] [v] [iv] רִבּוֹנוֹ שֶׁל עוֹלָם Master of the Universe,[2] may it be Your will that my rest shall be peaceful.[3]

[vi] ובמעמד בשם יתברך [vii] ויחודו [viii] הר סיני הגדול והנורא: [ix] And he should focus his intention on the blessed Name, His unity, and the great and awesome revelation at Mount Sinai.[A] 2645R

[A] Or: "And one should direct one's concentration to the blessed Name, Its unification, and the great and awe-inspiring event at Mount Sinai." — This alternate translation uses gender-neutral language ('one should' instead of 'he should') and offers slight variations in terminology that might better reflect the kabbalistic concept of 'yichud' (unification) rather than 'unity,' and emphasizes Mount Sinai as an 'event' rather than 'revelation,' which may be more historically precise.

[1] These philosophical descriptions of God combine kabbalistic concepts with medieval philosophical terminology influenced by Aristotle and Maimonides, showing how Ma'avar Yabok integrates multiple intellectual traditions.

[2] This traditional opening invocation acknowledges God's sovereignty over all creation and establishes a direct, personal address to the divine.

[3] This phrase carries profound significance in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, where it represents the dying person's final request for a peaceful transition from this world to the next. According to the book's instructions, this concise prayer is to be recited when raising ten fingers toward heaven, symbolizing acceptance of divine judgment and surrender of the soul.

[i] This refers to the mystical process of the soul's ascent after death, a key concept in Ma'avar Yabok which is symbolized by the book's title (Crossing of the Yabok).

[ii] Cf. Genesis 32 — This instruction for the dying person to meditate on divine unity while raising their hands echoes Jacob's surrender and transformation at the Jabbok crossing. The dying person, like Jacob, is preparing for a divine encounter that will transform their identity. | Cf. Zohar — This instruction follows Zoharic teachings that the final thoughts at death should focus on divine unity. The Zohar teaches that one's final meditation determines the soul's spiritual destination, making this instruction crucial for ensuring the soul's proper ascent.

[iii] This address to God as "Master of the Universe" is a common opening formula in Jewish prayers, particularly those related to moments of spiritual transition.

[iv] The phrase "my rest shall be peaceful" employs the term "menucha" (rest), which in the context of death rituals refers to the soul's repose after death. This prayer appears in Ma'avar Yabok specifically for recitation when a person is close to death.

[v] Cf. Psalm 31:6 — This prayer shares thematic connections with Psalm 31:6, which is explicitly recommended in Ma'avar Yabok for the moment of death. Both express surrender to divine care during the soul's transition. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok deathbed confession (vidui) — This short prayer serves as a condensed alternative for the dying person who is too weak to recite the full confession. It captures the essential spiritual surrender expressed in the longer confessional texts while being accessible even to someone in extremis.

[vi] The term 'yekhavein' (focus intention) is a technical term in Jewish mysticism referring to the practice of kavvanah (כוונה), or directing one's mental concentration and devotion during prayer or ritual actions. This mental focusing is particularly emphasized in kabbalistic practice.

[vii] Referring to the Divine Name (typically the Tetragrammaton YHVH), which in kabbalistic practice is often visualized or contemplated during prayer to create spiritual connections to higher realms.

[viii] This refers to the unity or unification (yichud) of God, a central concept in Jewish theology generally and Kabbalah specifically. In kabbalistic practice, this often refers to the unification of different divine attributes or the masculine and feminine aspects of divinity.

[ix] The revelation at Mount Sinai is considered the formative moment of Jewish covenant with God. In kabbalistic thought, practitioners are encouraged to mentally place themselves at Sinai during certain prayers and rituals, recreating the direct divine encounter experienced there.

בפרק ל״ה [i] שם כוונה נאותה [ii] לעומד בשעת יציאת נשמה: [iii] [iv]

In Chapter 35 there is an appropriate intention[A] (kavvanah) for one who stands by at the time of the soul's departure.[B]

בפרק ל״ו [v] יתבאר שם מה יכוון המפקיד נשמתו ביד אל ע״י פסוקים אלו: [vi] [vii]

In Chapter 36 it will be explained[C] what one should intend when entrusting one's soul into God's hand[D] through these verses:[1] 2650R

[A] Or: "suitable mystical meditation" — This alternate translation more explicitly conveys the kabbalistic nature of the kavvanah being referred to, which would involve specific mystical meditations rather than just a general intention.

[B] Or: "for one who attends at the moment of death" — This alternate translation uses more direct language that might be clearer to modern readers unfamiliar with the euphemistic Hebrew expression for death.

[C] Or: "Chapter 36 will elucidate there" — This is a more formal, academic translation that preserves the passive voice construction of the Hebrew original.

[D] Or: "the proper intentions for one who deposits their soul in God's keeping" — The term 'מפקיד' (mafkid) comes from the root meaning 'to deposit' or 'entrust for safekeeping,' which has legal connotations in Jewish law. This alternate translation emphasizes the technical nature of this spiritual act as a formal deposit of the soul with God.

[1] This heading likely introduces a section that would contain specific biblical verses recommended for recitation at the moment of death, particularly Psalm 31:6 ('Into Your hand I commit my spirit'), which became a traditional Jewish deathbed confession. The verses themselves are not included in this fragment.

[i] This is a cross-reference to another section of Ma'avar Yabok, demonstrating how the book is structured with interconnected chapters that refer readers to more detailed explanations elsewhere in the text.

[ii] In Kabbalistic practice, kavvanah (plural: kavvanot) refers to specific mystical intentions, meditations, or focuses of consciousness that one should maintain during prayer or ritual actions. These often involve visualizing divine names, spiritual configurations, or cosmic processes.

[iii] The moment of death (literally "at the time of the soul's departure") was considered a critical spiritual transition in Jewish mystical thought. Ma'avar Yabok provides extensive guidance for this moment, including specific prayers, visualizations, and intentions designed to facilitate the soul's journey.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 35 — This brief line serves as a cross-reference to a more detailed section of Ma'avar Yabok that explains the mystical intentions one should focus on when attending a dying person. In Kabbalistic practice, having the proper spiritual focus at the moment of death was considered crucial for helping the soul's transition to the next world. | Cf. Zohar — This reference to kavvanah (mystical intention) at the time of death reflects the Zoharic teaching that proper spiritual focus creates channels for the soul's ascent through higher worlds. The concept of yetziat neshamah (soul's departure) is extensively discussed in the Zohar, where specific meditations on divine names are prescribed for this critical transition.

[v] The abbreviation ל״ו represents the number 36 using Hebrew letters.

[vi] The phrase 'through these verses' suggests that the text that would normally follow this heading would contain specific biblical verses to be recited at the moment of death, along with explanations of their mystical significance and the proper intentions to accompany them.

[vii] Cf. Psalm 31:6 — This verse is most likely one of the 'verses' mentioned in this heading, as it's the traditional Jewish deathbed confession verse also reportedly recited by Jesus. Ma'avar Yabok is preparing to explain the proper mystical intentions (kavvanot) for this critical moment of soul transition. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 35 — The previous chapter apparently discusses the proper intentions for those attending to a dying person, while this chapter will focus on the intentions of the dying person themselves when reciting specific biblical verses at the moment of death. | Cf. Zohar, Vayechi — The Zohar section on Jacob's death (Vayechi) discusses the soul's departure and would likely be a source for the kabbalistic intentions explained in this chapter, as Ma'avar Yabok draws heavily on Zoharic literature for its understanding of death processes.

Chapter 22 contains explanations for placing one's gaze upon a person at the time of death. And in the

[A] Or: "I beheld the Lord" — The verb 'behold' carries a stronger sense of visionary experience than the more mundane 'see', which better captures the mystical nature of Isaiah's throne vision in this context.

[B] Or: "And contemplate this text with deep concentration" — This translation better captures the meditative quality implied by the instruction, which in the context of Ma'avar Yabok likely refers to a contemplative practice rather than mere intellectual study.

[1] The inclusion of this throne vision in Ma'avar Yabok is significant, as it appears in a section about deathbed rituals. The text creates a connection between the death of a king (Uzziah) and the revelation of divine glory, suggesting that death can be an occasion for spiritual elevation and divine vision.

[2] The covering of the seraphim's faces and feet with their wings is interpreted in Jewish mystical tradition as representing proper reverence before divine glory. This teaches the dying person proper spiritual attitude—humility combined with readiness for divine service (represented by the wings used for flying).

[3] This threefold declaration became part of the daily prayers and is traditionally recited with the worshipper rising on tiptoes with each repetition, symbolizing ascent toward the divine. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this may suggest the soul's imminent ascent at death.

[i] The visionary experience described here is Isaiah's famous throne vision (Isaiah 6:1-3), one of the most significant mystical visions in the Hebrew Bible and a foundational text for Jewish mystical traditions, particularly Merkavah mysticism.

[ii] Seraphim (literally "burning ones") are a class of angels described only in this passage in the Bible. In Kabbalistic tradition, they are associated with the sefirah of Binah (Understanding) and represent the intense fire of divine love.

[iii] This threefold repetition of "holy" (known as the Kedushah or Trisagion) became a central element of Jewish liturgy. In Kabbalistic interpretation, the triple declaration corresponds to the three upper sefirot: Keter, Chokhmah, and Binah.

[iv] This instruction to "study this passage with careful attention" is not part of the biblical text but is added by the author of Ma'avar Yabok, indicating the importance of contemplating this vision in preparation for death.

[v] Cf. Zohar — The Zohar states that at the moment of death, the soul is granted a vision of the divine glory similar to Isaiah's throne vision. By reciting and meditating on this passage, the dying person prepares for this ultimate spiritual experience. | Cf. Hekhalot Literature — The ancient mystical Hekhalot (Heavenly Palaces) texts describe techniques for visualizing the divine throne, similar to what Isaiah experienced. Ma'avar Yabok adapts this tradition for the deathbed, suggesting that proper contemplation of the throne vision prepares the soul for its heavenly ascent. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — According to memory note #573, this passage relates to Chapter 35 of Ma'avar Yabok, which provides instructions on the proper spiritual intention (kavvanah) for those present when a soul departs from the body. | Cf. Daily Prayer Liturgy — The threefold declaration of "Holy, holy, holy" forms the core of the Kedushah prayer recited during daily services. In this context, its recitation at the deathbed connects the individual's passing to the communal worship experience and the eternal angelic praise.

aforementioned chapter, there is a reason given for why it is customary to open windows in the place where a dying person lies, along with many matters pertaining to this subject: It is advisable not to stand at the foot of the bed of a dying person[A] since the Angel of Death stands opposite him with his sword drawn in his hand;[B] see Chapter 6, Discourse 3. One must also be careful that at the time of death no limb remains outside the bed, and for the reason behind this, see Chapter 37, and in Chapter 38, Discourse 1, which contains the proper intention for the Sabbath prayer "Ana Bekoach,"[1] etc. Further information on this can be found in Chapter 24, Discourse 5. Chapter 39 contains the proper intention for unifying the Shema Yisrael[2] and "Baruch Shem Kevod Malchuto Le'olam Va'ed"[3] at the time of death, and the uni- 2665R 2670R 2675R

[A] Or: "stand at the feet of a deathbed" — This more concise phrasing maintains the meaning while being slightly more idiomatic in English. The term 'deathbed' efficiently captures the concept of a bed where someone is dying.

[B] Or: "because the Angel of Death positions himself there with drawn sword in hand" — This alternate is slightly more concise while maintaining the meaning. The word 'positions' conveys the deliberate placement of the angel in this specific location.

[1] "Ana Bekoach" is a mystical prayer containing encoded divine names, particularly the 42-letter name of God. In kabbalistic practice, proper intention (kavvanah) while reciting this prayer was believed to activate divine forces. The text suggests similar meditative techniques should be applied at the time of death.

[2] The Shema Yisrael ("Hear O Israel") is Judaism's central declaration of monotheistic faith. In kabbalistic thought, reciting it with proper intention at death was considered especially powerful for facilitating the soul's transition. The word "unifying" (yichud) has special mystical significance, referring to the unification of various divine attributes and spiritual worlds.

[3] This phrase ("Blessed be the name of His glorious kingdom forever and ever") is recited quietly after the first line of the Shema in daily prayers, but is said aloud on Yom Kippur. The text's

[i] This is a reference to a previous chapter that discusses the mystical reasons for keeping one's gaze on a dying person. The practice of watching over the dying has both practical and spiritual significance in Jewish tradition.

[ii] The custom of opening windows when someone is dying relates to kabbalistic beliefs about facilitating the soul's departure. It was believed that opening windows created a pathway for the soul to leave the room and begin its journey to the next world.

[iii] This reflects the kabbalistic belief that the Angel of Death stands at the foot of the bed with a drawn sword. This belief led to the practical instruction to avoid standing at the foot of a dying person's bed, as one might interfere with the angel's duty or be affected by its presence.

[iv] This instruction that no limb should remain outside the bed at the time of death reflects mystical concerns about the soul's complete departure from the body. There was a belief that any part of the body outside the defined space of the bed might create spiritual complications for the departing soul.

[v] "Ana Bekoach" is a kabbalistic prayer attributed to the 1st-century sage Rabbi Nehunya ben HaKanah. It contains the 42-letter name of God and is considered to have special mystical power. The text suggests there are specific intentions (kavvanot) related to this prayer that are relevant at the time of death.

[vi] This refers to the mystical intentions for reciting the Shema prayer ("Hear O Israel") and the response "Blessed be the name of His glorious kingdom forever and ever" (abbreviated as ובשכמל״ו) at the time of death. These declarations were considered especially powerful for facilitating the soul's proper transition.

fication that the righteous person performs with his soul at the time of its departure.[1] Those attending to him should also direct their thoughts to this if they have been granted understanding,[A] and likewise the dying person himself if he has seen spiritual light during his lifetime.[B] Chapter 24, Discourse 5 also explains the proper recitation of the Shema near death,[C] especially if it is recited at its proper time.[2] Chapter 15, Discourse 2 provides the reason for lighting candles before a dying person,[3] in the house of the deceased for all seven days of mourning, and in the synagogue for all twelve months. Many matters pertaining to this can be found there and in abbreviation בשכמל״ו stands for these words. At the time of death, it was considered appropriate to recite this response at full volume, similar to Yom Kippur.

[A] Or: "if they possess mystical insight" — This alternate more clearly conveys the kabbalistic meaning of the Hebrew term 'binah' in this context, which refers specifically to mystical understanding rather than general comprehension.

[B] Or: "if he attained mystical illumination during his life" — This alternate more explicitly conveys the kabbalistic concept of 'seeing light' as a metaphor for mystical attainment and spiritual enlightenment.

[C] Or: "the mystical procedure for reciting Shema at the approach of death" — This alternate better captures the kabbalistic meaning of 'tikkun' as a mystical procedure or correction rather than simply proper recitation, emphasizing the spiritual mechanics involved.

[1] In kabbalistic thought, death was viewed as an opportunity for the highest spiritual unification (yichud) between the individual soul and divine realms. Those who had achieved spiritual refinement during their lifetime could experience death not as trauma but as a transcendent reunion with divine source.

[2] In Jewish tradition, prayers have optimal times for recitation based on astronomical and spiritual factors. The text suggests that if death happens to occur at the regular time for reciting the Shema (morning or evening), the prayer's effectiveness for the soul's transition is enhanced.

[3] The practice of lighting candles near the dying and deceased connects to Proverbs 20:27, "The soul of man is the candle of God." Beyond practical illumination, candles symbolize the divine soul and were believed to provide spiritual guidance for the departing soul and comfort for those remaining.

[i] This describes the spiritual unification that a righteous person achieves with their soul at the moment of death. In kabbalistic thought, death can be a moment of supreme spiritual connection if approached with proper intention and preparation.

[ii] This suggests that those attending the dying person should direct their thoughts to the same spiritual unifications if they have the capacity for such understanding. Likewise, the dying person should do so if they gained spiritual insight during their lifetime. The phrase "saw light" (ראה אור) is often used to describe someone who has attained mystical understanding.

[iii] This refers to the proper recitation (תקון/tikkun) of the Shema prayer (abbreviated as ק״ש) near death, noting that it is especially powerful when recited at its designated time in the daily prayer cycle. The abbreviation ו״כ ש stands for וכל שכן ("all the more so").

[iv] This describes the custom of lighting candles in the presence of a dying person, in the house of the deceased during the seven days of mourning (shiva), and in the synagogue (abbreviated as ב״ה for בית הכנסת) for the entire twelve months of mourning. Candles symbolize the soul in Jewish tradition, based on the verse "The soul of man is the candle of God" (Proverbs 20:27).

Chapter 6, Discourse 3 — This reference points to an earlier detailed explanation about the Angel of Death's position during death, providing the spiritual reasoning behind the practical instruction not to stand at the foot of the bed. | Cf. conversation.[3] In Chapter 24 of the fifth discourse:
If the sick person is a Torah scholar, it is good to encourage him to occasionally recite the awesome prayer[4] that is praised in the Book of Tikkunim, which we have printed in our "Me'irei Shachar" on 2705R

[A] Or: "In the fourth chapter of the third discourse" — The Hebrew abbreviation פ״ד could be rendered as 'fourth chapter' rather than 'Chapter 4' for greater clarity in English.

[B] Or: ""open rebuke is [a sign of] hidden love,"" — This adds interpretive clarity to the proverb (based on Proverbs 27:5) by making explicit that the rebuke is evidence of love rather than being love itself.

[C] Or: "where there is, Heaven forbid, [the Angel of Death]" — The abbreviation ב״מ likely stands for בר מינן (bar minan), a euphemistic phrase meaning 'far be it from us' or 'Heaven forbid,' used when referring to the Angel of Death. This alternate preserves the euphemistic nature of the original text.

[1] This concluding statement reflects the encyclopedic nature of Ma'avar Yabok, which provides comprehensive guidance on death rituals with extensive cross-references between sections. The author encourages readers to explore related chapters for complete understanding of these interconnected practices.

[2] This instruction reflects the Jewish belief that the deathbed is a sacred space requiring proper reverence and focus. Idle talk was considered disrespectful to the dying and potentially disruptive to the soul's transition process.

[3] The phrase 'all the more so' (ק״ו/kal vachomer) is a rabbinic logical principle arguing from minor to major cases. If idle talk is prohibited, then certainly inappropriate or forbidden speech would be even more severely prohibited.

[4] The instruction to 'encourage' rather than require the recitation acknowledges the sick person's condition and capacity, showing sensitivity to their state while still providing appropriate spiritual guidance.

Chapter 38, Discourse 1 — This reference connects death rituals with Sabbath mystical practices, specifically the meditation on the 42-letter divine name encoded in the Ana Bekoach prayer, suggesting that similar meditative techniques apply to both contexts. | Cf. Chapter 24, Discourse 5 — This reference directs readers to detailed instructions about the proper way to recite the Shema prayer when death is approaching, highlighting the importance of this prayer as a spiritual preparation for the soul's transition. | Cf. Chapter 39 — This reference points to mystical practices where the declaration of divine unity in the Shema prayer facilitates the soul's proper separation from the body and ascent to higher realms, particularly for those with spiritual insight. | Cf. Chapter 15, Discourse 2 — This reference directs readers to the mystical reasons for lighting candles in the presence of a dying person and during the mourning period, likely relating to the symbolism of light guiding the soul and providing spiritual illumination during the transition between worlds.

[i] Cf. Proverbs 27:5 — The author applies this proverb to justify the religious obligation to maintain proper decorum around the dying, suggesting that correcting inappropriate behavior is an act of love toward both the dying person and others present. | Cf. Me'irei Shachar — The reference indicates that the prayer recommended for Torah scholars comes from another work by the same

[A] Or: "When a person takes leave of the sick person after visiting them, they should recite:" — This alternate translation uses 'takes leave of' instead of 'departs from' and 'recite' instead of 'say,' which might better capture the formal ritual context. Both translations are accurate, but this alternative emphasizes the ceremonial aspect of the instruction.

[B] Or: "and may He overflow with compassion upon you" — The Aramaic 'יִתְמַלֵּי' has a sense of filling to overflowing, which might be better captured with this alternative. This translation emphasizes the abundance of divine compassion being invoked.

[1] Traditional Jewish texts often use folio pagination (with 'a' for the front of the page and 'b' for the back). The specific page reference indicates the author's attention to detailed citation, facilitating practical use of this manual.

[2] I've maintained the conventional English translation of this formal Aramaic title for God, which appears frequently in Jewish mystical texts and carries a sense of reverence.

[3] The original Aramaic contains subtle distinctions between 'יָחוֹס' (having mercy/showing favor) and 'יִתְמַלֵּי רַחֲמִין' (being filled with compassion). This prayer appears to be directed to a sick or dying person, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's focus on deathbed rituals.

[4] This prayer appears to be a continuation of a longer prayer sequence for the sick in Ma'avar Yabok, as indicated by the opening words "And he shall continue saying."

author, showing how Ma'avar Yabok is part of a broader system of ritual texts aimed at providing comprehensive spiritual guidance. | Cf. Sefer HaTikkunim — The reference to the 'Book of Tikkunim' (likely Tikkunei Zohar) establishes the kabbalistic authority for the special prayer recommended for Torah scholars, indicating that even the deathbed practices for scholars should incorporate mystical elements.

[i] This indicates that this instruction is found in Chapter 24 of the Fifth Discourse of Ma'avar Yabok.

[ii] The term "niftar" (נפטר) here means "departs from" or "takes leave of" rather than "passes away," which would be another meaning of this term in other contexts.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 24 — The reference indicates that this instruction is part of a larger systematic framework for the mitzvah of visiting the sick (bikur cholim). Chapter 24 likely contains a complete set of instructions for properly concluding such a visit, with this fragment introducing the prayer to be recited upon departure.

[iv] This Aramaic phrase literally means "the Holy One, blessed be He" and is a common way to refer to God in Aramaic Jewish texts, particularly in the Zohar and other kabbalistic literature.

[v] This Aramaic expression combines two related blessings: "may He have mercy toward you" and "may He be filled with compassion upon you." The repetitive structure is typical of Aramaic blessings and creates a poetic emphasis.

[vi] Cf. Zohar — By using this traditional Aramaic formula from mystical literature, Ma'avar Yabok connects its deathbed rituals to the larger kabbalistic tradition, suggesting that the dying person is being blessed with the same divine compassion described in foundational mystical texts.

[vii] This is a common opening formula for personal prayers in Jewish liturgy, literally meaning "Master of the Universe."

וַחֲסָדֶיךָ[i] וּלְמַעַן שִׁמְךָ הַגָּדוֹל וְאַל תָּבִישׁ הַחוֹלֶה הַזֶּה מִסִּבְרוֹ[ii] וְכָל חוֹלֵי עַמְּךָ יִשְׂרָאֵל יִהְיוּ בִּכְלָל הָרַחֲמִים.[iii]

This text provides guidance on how a person should view suffering as atonement for sins,[A] with each bodily affliction corresponding precisely to specific transgressions[4]—measure for measure. Many additional details appear in chapters 20 and 21 of the first discourse, which are beneficial to read to the deathly ill person[B] so they may accept their suffering with love. One should also release the sick person from any unfulfilled vows they might have.[C] See chapter

[A] Or: "how a person should direct their intention regarding the sufferings that come upon them" — The original Hebrew uses the term 'yechavin' (direct one's intention) which has a more specific meaning in kabbalistic contexts than merely 'view.' This alternate captures the active spiritual work involved in properly understanding one's suffering.

[B] Or: "before one who is critically ill (shechiv mera)" — The abbreviation ש״מ stands for 'shechiv mera,' a halakhic category for someone critically ill and likely to die. This translation preserves the technical term while explaining its meaning.

[C] Or: "And they should perform the ritual of annulling the sick person's vows, if they have

[1] The Hebrew uses two distinct terms for divine compassion: "rachamim" (mercy/compassion) and "chasadim" (loving-kindness/benevolence), representing different but complementary aspects of God's compassionate nature.

[2] The concept here relates to the sick person's hope for recovery. The prayer asks that this hope not be disappointed, which would cause shame or embarrassment.

[3] This prayer exemplifies a common pattern in Jewish liturgy: moving from the particular (this specific sick person) to the universal (all sick people among Israel), reflecting the value of communal responsibility.

[4] This reflects the kabbalistic understanding that the human body is a microcosm of divine reality, with each part corresponding to specific spiritual forces. Ma'avar Yabok presents a comprehensive system mapping bodily afflictions to particular sins, allowing for precise spiritual diagnosis and treatment.

[i] This formulaic appeal is based on biblical language and appears frequently in Jewish prayers, asking God to act not because of human merit but because of divine attributes of mercy.

[ii] The phrase contains the concept of not disappointing or putting to shame one who hopes or trusts in God, a motif found in Psalms (25:2-3, 31:2).

[iii] The phrase "included in compassion/mercy" is a standard formula in Jewish prayers for the sick, extending the prayer from the individual to the community.

[iv] The concept of 'measure for measure' (midah k'neged midah) is a fundamental principle in Jewish theology, asserting that divine punishment corresponds precisely to one's sins. In Ma'avar Yabok, this principle is applied to illness, suggesting that specific physical afflictions correspond to particular sins, creating a framework for understanding suffering as targeted spiritual correction rather than random misfortune.

[v] The phrase 'accepting suffering with love' (kabalat yisurin me'ahavah) refers to the spiritual practice of embracing suffering as divinely ordained and spiritually beneficial rather than merely enduring it. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this represents the ideal attitude toward death-related suffering, transforming it from meaningless pain into purposeful spiritual purification.

[vi] The annulment of vows (hatarat nedarim) was considered spiritually significant for the seriously ill, based on the belief that unfulfilled vows might be contributing to the person's condition. This practice reflects Ma'avar Yabok's integrated approach to spiritual healing, addressing multiple possible spiritual causes of illness.

[vii] Cf. Deuteronomy 25:2 — The text draws on the biblical concept that divine justice operates any" — This translation more clearly indicates that a formal ritual of vow annulment (hatarat nedarim) is being referenced, not just a casual releasing from obligations.

[A] Or: "markers of the psalms that are fitting to be recited" — This more literal translation preserves the metaphor of 'markers' or 'signposts' (ציוני) in the original, which might be relevant if the author is conceptualizing these psalms as spiritual landmarks or guideposts.

[B] Or: "Each person should select from them what appears appropriate in their judgment" — This alternate translation uses more contemporary phrasing while maintaining the meaning. It might be preferred for clarity in modern contexts, though it loses some of the biblical resonance of the original idiom.

[1] I've expanded the Aramaic phrase "ש״מ דתקיף ליה עלמא" to convey its full meaning about a person in critical condition who is suffering intensely.

[2] The passage mentions 28 psalms total, and indeed, exactly 28 psalm numbers are listed in the text.

through appropriate correspondence between sin and consequence, suggesting that by understanding this relationship, the sick person can mentally connect their physical sufferings to specific sins they've committed, thereby transforming physical pain into spiritual atonement. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Nedarim 8a — The text references the rabbinic belief that unfulfilled vows can contribute to or exacerbate illness, making their annulment an important spiritual intervention alongside acceptance of suffering as atonement. This shows how Ma'avar Yabok integrates multiple rabbinic traditions about illness causation. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, First Discourse, Chapters 20-21 — The text is self-referential, directing readers to earlier sections of Ma'avar Yabok that provide the detailed framework for understanding the spiritual meaning of physical suffering. This demonstrates the book's systematic approach to death preparation, with each section building on previously established concepts.

[i] The abbreviation "ש״מ" stands for "shechiv mera" (deathly ill person), and "דתקיף ליה עלמא" is an Aramaic phrase meaning "whom the world greatly oppresses" or "who is suffering greatly," referring to someone critically ill.

[ii] The number 28 corresponds to the numerical value of the Hebrew word "כח" (koach, meaning "power"). The phrase "the mighty hand and the outstretched arm" refers to biblical descriptions of God's power, particularly in the Exodus narrative. The author is suggesting a mystical connection between these 28 psalms and divine power.

[iii] The text refers to the kabbalistic concept of "28 camps of the Divine Presence (Shekhinah)," suggesting that reciting these psalms creates a mystical unification with these divine forces.

[iv] Cf. Chapter 5, Third Discourse of Ma'avar Yabok — The text explicitly references this chapter for further explanation of the 28 camps of the Divine Presence and their mystical significance in relation to the psalms recommended for the critically ill. | Cf. (Psalm 84) For the Chief Musician, on the Gittith.[A3] A Psalm of the sons of Korah.[4] How lovely are Your dwelling places,[B] O LORD of hosts! My soul longs, indeed faints for the courts of the LORD;[5] my heart and my flesh cry out for the living God. Even the bird has found a home, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may place her young ones—at Your altars, O LORD of hosts, my King and my God. Blessed are those who dwell in Your house; they will still praise You. Selah. Blessed is the man whose strength is in You, in whose heart are the highways to Zion. Passing through the valley of Baca, they make it a spring;[C] the early 2745R 2750R

[A] Or: "according to the Gittith" — The Hebrew preposition 'al' with musical terms can be translated as either 'on' or 'according to'—the latter may better convey that this refers to a musical style, instrument, or melody rather than a physical location.

[B] Or: "How beloved are Your tabernacles" — The term 'yedidot' has connotations of beloved or cherished rather than merely aesthetically pleasing, and 'mishkenot' specifically refers to tabernacles or dwelling places of a sacred nature, which could be emphasized in a more literal translation.

[C] Or: "As they pass through the Valley of Weeping, they make it a place of springs" — 'Baca' can be interpreted as a proper name of a place, but it also means 'weeping' or 'tears' in Hebrew. Many scholarly translations render it as 'Valley of Weeping' to convey the metaphorical meaning rather than treating it as a specific geographical location.

[1] This is a standard liturgical instruction in Ma'avar Yabok. The implied subject is either the sick person (if capable) or someone attending to them.

[2] This cross-reference indicates that the book is designed as a practical manual. Rather than repeating the full text of these psalms, the reader is directed to where they appeared earlier in the text, demonstrating the systematic organization of Ma'avar Yabok as a reference guide for deathbed rituals.

[3] This superscription indicates performance instructions. While "lamnatzeaḥ" clearly refers to the director of music or chief musician, the meaning of "al-hagittit" remains debated among scholars. It might refer to a musical instrument, a particular melody, or a style of music from the Philistine city of Gath.

[4] The Korahites were a Levitical family who served as temple musicians and gatekeepers. Psalms 42-49, 84-85, and 87-88 are attributed to them. Their ancestral connection to the sanctuary makes their authorship of this psalm about temple longing particularly meaningful.

[5] The Hebrew uses two intense verbs ("nikhsefah" and "khaletah") that express extreme yearning and exhaustion from desire. This suggests the psalm may have originated from someone unable to access the temple, perhaps during exile or a pilgrimage journey.

mystical significance of the number 28 and its connection to divine power. | Cf. Exodus narrative — The phrases "the mighty hand and the outstretched arm" allude to biblical descriptions of God's power in delivering Israel from Egypt (Deuteronomy 4:34, 5:15, 7:19, 11:2, 26:8). These expressions of divine power are connected to the healing properties of the recommended psalms.

[i] This is a liturgical instruction indicating which psalms should be recited for a sick person. The notation uses Hebrew letters as numbers: ט״ו (15), כ׳ (20), כ״ב (22), כ״ג (23), כ״ד (24), כ״ה (25), ל׳ (30), מ׳ (40), מ״ג (43), נ״א (51), ס״ו (67).

[ii] This phrase means "you will find [them] above" and refers to the fact that these psalms were previously included in full text earlier in the book, so they are not repeated here.

You![5]

[A] Or: "the autumn rain also covers it with blessings" — The Hebrew 'moreh' specifically refers to the autumn or early rain in the agricultural cycle of ancient Israel, rather than just any early rain. This specific seasonal reference adds contextual meaning to the passage.

[B] Or: "I would rather stand at the threshold of the house of my God" — The Hebrew 'histofef' does not specifically mean to be a doorkeeper (an official position), but rather to stand at the threshold or to be on the edge of a sacred space. It conveys humility in just being present at the entrance rather than occupying an official role.

[1] This powerful metaphor describes the spiritual growth experienced during pilgrimage. Rather than becoming exhausted, the travelers gain increasing vigor as they approach their sacred destination. This verse has become an enduring image of spiritual progress in Jewish and Christian traditions.

[2] The psalm shifts here from describing pilgrims to a direct prayer, suggesting it may have been used liturgically at a point when pilgrims arrived at the temple. The image of God as a shield appears again in verse 11, creating a frame around this section of the psalm.

[3] This powerful comparative statement forms the emotional climax of the psalm. The intense valuation of sacred space—where a single day outweighs a thousand elsewhere—explains the psalmist's yearning expressed in earlier verses.

[4] The Hebrew "tamim" (translated as "uprightly") refers to completeness, integrity, and wholeness rather than moral perfection. The promise is that God's blessings flow to those whose lives are characterized by integrity and undivided devotion.

[5] The psalm begins and ends with statements of blessedness ("ashrei"), creating a frame that emphasizes that true happiness comes from proximity to God (dwelling in God's house) and reliance on God (trusting in God). This forms a thematic inclusion that unifies the entire psalm.

[i] Cf. Psalm 42 — Both psalms use intense physical yearning language ('longing,' 'thirsting,' 'fainting') to describe spiritual desire for God's presence. In Psalm 84, 'my soul longs, indeed faints' parallels Psalm 42's 'my soul thirsts for God.' Both express the psalmist's intense spiritual longing using bodily metaphors. | Cf. Psalm 27 — Psalm 84's celebration of those who 'dwell in Your house' echoes Psalm 27:4's 'One thing I have asked from the LORD... to dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life.' Both psalms present proximity to God's sanctuary as the ultimate blessing and privilege. | Cf. Exodus 23 — The phrase 'appears before God in Zion' in Psalm 84:7 likely alludes to the three annual pilgrimage festivals when Israelites were commanded to 'appear before the Lord.' The psalm thus celebrates these pilgrimage journeys to Jerusalem, depicting them as sources of spiritual strength and blessing. | Cf. Psalm 43 — Psalm 84's longing for God's courts echoes Psalm 43's plea to be led to God's 'holy hill' and 'tabernacles.' Both psalms portray God's sanctuary as the destination of spiritual journey and the place where true joy is found. | Cf. Song of Songs — The intense yearning expressed in Psalm 84 for God's dwelling places parallels the lover's desire in Song of Songs to know where the beloved rests and dwells. Both texts use the language of passionate desire to describe a spiritual relationship. In Jewish mystical tradition, both texts were interpreted as expressing the soul's longing for divine union.

[A] Or: "In my straits" — The Hebrew term "tzarah" literally means "narrowness" or "constriction," which can be rendered as "straits" to preserve the spatial metaphor. This might better convey the feeling of confinement or limitation experienced during illness, which would be relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's context.

[3] This psalm opens with a cry of distress, fitting for its inclusion in Ma'avar Yabok's section on prayers for the sick and dying. The speaker's plea for divine deliverance from hostile surroundings would resonate with someone suffering illness or approaching death.

[4] The request for deliverance from falsehood may have been particularly significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which emphasizes the importance of truth-telling with the sick and dying, rather than false reassurance.

[5] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this sentiment could be interpreted as the suffering person's [iii] "Song of Ascents" is the title given to fifteen psalms (Psalms 120-134) that were likely sung by pilgrims ascending to Jerusalem for the three annual festivals, or by Levites ascending the steps to the Temple.

[iv] "Coals of broom wood" (retem in Hebrew) refers to the desert broom plant, which produces particularly hot-burning and long-lasting coals, used metaphorically here to describe the lasting harm caused by deceitful speech.

[v] Meshech refers to a barbaric tribe descended from Japheth (Genesis 10:2), located far to the north of Israel, possibly in the region of modern Turkey or the Caucasus.

(Psalm 121) A Song of Ascents. I will lift up my eyes to the mountains;[1] from where will my help come? My help comes from the LORD, Maker of heaven and earth. He will not allow your foot to slip; your Guardian will not slumber. Behold, the Guardian of Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps. The LORD is your Guardian; the LORD is your shade upon your right hand.[2] The sun will not harm you by day, nor the moon by night.[3] The LORD will guard you from all evil; He will protect your soul. The LORD will guard your going out and your coming in[4] from now and forevermore. 2780R 2785R 2790R

The psalms numbered 130, 140, 141, 142, 143, 148, weariness with the conflict between life and death, or the soul's desire to depart from a body and world characterized by strife.

[1]This opening line establishes a visual metaphor of looking upward, which in the context of Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed rituals takes on additional significance as the upward journey of the departing soul.

[2]The right side is associated with mercy and kindness in kabbalistic tradition, while the left is associated with judgment. God providing shade specifically 'upon your right hand' suggests divine mercy tempering the intensity of spiritual light during the soul's transition.

[3]In mystical interpretation, the sun and moon represent different types of spiritual influences or judgments. This verse promises protection from all forms of harmful spiritual forces, particularly relevant during the vulnerable time of death when the soul faces various spiritual trials.

[4]While this typically refers to daily activities in life, in the context of Ma'avar Yabok's death rituals, this phrase takes on deeper significance as referring to the soul's exit from the body ('going out') and entrance into the afterlife ('coming in').

Yabok — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok suggests it was considered particularly appropriate for those experiencing serious illness or approaching death, perhaps because it expresses both distress in hostile surroundings and confidence in divine response.

[i]The Hebrew phrase can be read as both a statement ('I lift my eyes to the mountains') and as a question ('Shall I lift my eyes to the mountains?'). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this ambiguity takes on spiritual significance, suggesting the soul's questioning of where to turn at the moment of transition.

[ii]The Hebrew 'me'ayin' (from where) contains the word 'ayin' (nothingness), creating a mystical reading: 'my help comes from divine nothingness,' referring to God's transcendence beyond all definition.

[iii]The image of God as 'shade' (tzel) is significant in kabbalistic thought, representing divine protection that shields but doesn't obstruct spiritual light completely. In the context of death rituals in Ma'avar Yabok, this represents the perfect balance of divine presence during the soul's transition.

[iv]The Hebrew 'nafshecha' (your soul) specifically refers to the nefesh level of the soul in kabbalistic thought. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this indicates divine protection specifically for the aspect of soul most connected to the body during the separation process of death.

[v]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — Psalm 121 appears in Ma'avar Yabok as a protective prayer to be recited three times by those attending a sick person, reflecting the belief that this psalm has special power to invoke divine protection during illness and at the time of death. | Cf. Zohar — The psalm's emphasis on divine guardianship connects to the Zoharic concept that while the soul experiences suffering during its departure from the body, it encounters divine mercy after separation is complete. | Cf. Traditional Jewish liturgy — This psalm is traditionally recited as part of the bedtime Shema ritual, creating a parallel between sleep and death, with both requiring divine protection.

And these are the 112 verses[1] from Torah, Prophets, and Writings together—all of them beneficial to carry on one's lips, whether the Israelite person himself or those attending him as he crosses over the Ford of Jabbok from below to above.[A] The count of these verses corresponds to the unification of three Divine Names: YHVH, Ehyeh, and Adonut,[2] which together equal 112. Between the verses from Torah to Prophets, and likewise to Writings, two or three psalms from those indicated should be recited. The one who recites should have in mind that the spark of the sick person's soul is included within his own soul,[B] in the manner that "all Israel are guarantors for one another." Through my strength, I give strength and vigor to him, and my mouth is like his mouth, and my speech like the speech of one lying on a sickbed. And just as one adds a flow of divine favor to the soul of this person, so shall increase be added to him in abundance, life, grace,

[A] Or: "during his passage through the Ford of Jabbok from the lower realm to the higher realm" — This alternate translation more explicitly conveys the kabbalistic concept of spiritual ascent through different realms or worlds, which is implied in the Hebrew terms 'tachtit' (lower) and 'ilit' (higher).

[B] Or: "the divine spark of the sick person's soul is encompassed within his own soul" — This alternative emphasizes the divine nature of the soul spark, which is implied in kabbalistic understanding of 'nitzotz neshama' (soul spark) as a fragment of divinity.

[1] The text refers to a specific collection of biblical verses compiled in Ma'avar Yabok for recitation at the deathbed. The number 112 is significant because it equals the numerical value of three divine names mentioned in the text.

[2] In Jewish mysticism, reciting verses corresponding to divine names creates a spiritual unification (yichud) that helps elevate the soul. These specific names represent different aspects of God's nature and relationship with humanity.

[i] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's 'Seder' section — This brief reference directs the reader to psalms that have already been included earlier in the text. This type of cross-reference was a common feature in early printed books, allowing the author to avoid repetition while ensuring readers could locate important content. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these psalms form part of the liturgical sequences designed to be recited for or by the sick and dying.

[ii] The number 112 (קי״ב) is significant as it equals the combined numerical value of three divine names mentioned later in the text. This gematria (Hebrew numerology) creates a mystical correspondence between the number of verses and divine unity.

[iii] This phrase has dual meaning: literally referring to Jacob's biblical crossing of the Jabbok River, and metaphorically representing the soul's transition from the physical world ('below') to spiritual realms ('above') at death.

[iv] These three divine names represent different aspects of God in Kabbalah: YHVH (the Tetragrammaton) represents God's eternal unchanging nature, Ehyeh ('I will be') represents God's self-revelation to Moses at the burning bush, and Adonut represents God's sovereignty. Their numerical values are: YHVH (26) + Ehyeh (21) + Adonut (65) = 112.

[v] This reflects the kabbalistic concept that all Jewish souls are interconnected, with each containing sparks of the others. This mystical interconnection enables one person to effectively pray or recite verses on behalf of another.

[A] Or: "And just as he channels a flow of divine will to the soul of this person, so shall he receive increase in abundance, vitality, grace, and loving-kindness" — This alternative more directly captures the reciprocal spiritual dynamic described, where the person praying actively channels divine energy (shefa ratzon) rather than merely adding to it, and receives specific spiritual qualities in return.

[1] This is a principle of reciprocal spiritual benefit, suggesting that those who help elevate the souls of others receive divine blessing in return. It encourages participation in the deathbed ritual as spiritually beneficial for both the dying and those attending them.

[2] This section serves as a formal opening to the recitation of 112 biblical verses that Ma'avar Yabok prescribes for those approaching death. These introductory verses establish a solemn, sacred atmosphere through invocations of divine presence and protection.

[3] This passage combines verses from multiple biblical sources to create a comprehensive prayer of protection. The opening verses from Deuteronomy 32 invoke divine attention, followed by verses from various Psalms that emphasize divine protection, trust, and deliverance.

[i] This is a play on a rabbinic principle similar to 'measure for measure' (midah k'neged midah), suggesting that divine reward corresponds to human action. Here it specifically means that by adding benefit to another's soul, one receives spiritual addition to one's own soul.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok (Title of the book) — The mention of 'crossing the Ford of Jabbok' (מעבר יבק) directly references the book's title and central metaphor. Just as Jacob crossed the Jabbok before his transformative encounter, the soul crosses from the physical world to the spiritual realm at death. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Shevuot 39a — The phrase 'all Israel are guarantors for one another' is a direct quotation from the Talmud, used here to explain the mystical connection between souls that allows one person to recite verses on behalf of another. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Shabbat 104a — The final phrase 'whoever adds, addition is made for him' echoes this Talmudic principle, suggesting that the merit earned by helping a dying person is reciprocated with divine blessing. | Cf. Genesis 32:22-32 — The phrase 'crossing over the Ford of Jabbok from below to above' alludes to Jacob's biblical crossing but reinterprets it kabbalistically as the soul's ascent from the lower to higher spiritual worlds.

[iii] This heading marks the beginning of an introductory prayer sequence before the recitation of the 112 biblical verses that follow. This structure is typical of Ma'avar Yabok's organized approach to deathbed liturgy.

[iv] Cf. Deuteronomy 32:1 — This verse calls heaven and earth to witness, establishing a cosmic framework for what follows. In the context of deathbed rituals, it summons the entirety of creation to attend to the solemnity of the moment when a soul prepares to depart. | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:2 — This verse uses natural metaphors of rain and dew to express how divine teaching penetrates and nourishes. In Ma'avar Yabok, this suggests how the biblical verses that follow should gently refresh and sustain the soul of the dying person. | Cf. Psalm 46:8, 12 — These verses provide assurance of divine protection at a time of vulnerability. The repetition of 'the LORD of hosts is with us' creates a protective spiritual environment around the dying person. | Cf. Psalm 20:10 — This verse petitions God to hear and respond, particularly relevant when praying for someone transitioning between worlds, when divine attention is especially sought. | Cf. Psalm 32:7 — This verse portrays God as both shelter and source of joy even amid distress, offering comfort to the dying person that they are encompassed by divine protection. | Cf. Isaiah 26:4 — This verse encourages absolute trust in God's eternal nature, providing a theological foundation for surrendering one's soul to divine care at death. | Cf. Psalm 29:11 — This verse invokes divine strength and peace at a time when physical strength is failing, reassuring that God's peace transcends physical decline. | Cf. Zohar, Vayakhel — This reference to four archangels (Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, and Noriel) and the Divine Presence above creates a visualization of divine protection encompassing the dying person from all directions, creating a safe spiritual passage.

[1]The Hebrew term 'ranei palet' literally means 'songs of deliverance' or 'joyful cries of escape,' suggesting that divine protection includes not only safety but also jubilation at being rescued.

[2]In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which deals with death and transition, the image of God as an 'everlasting rock' (tzur olamim) takes on special significance, contrasting divine permanence with human mortality.

[3]The Hebrew text concludes with a non-biblical formula invoking angelic protection. This protective arrangement—with four archangels surrounding the person and the Divine Presence above—creates a spiritual shield around the ill or dying person from all directions. This formula appears frequently in Jewish protective prayers and amulets.

[i]Cf. Deuteronomy 32:1-2 — The opening verses are a direct quote from the beginning of Moses' song in Deuteronomy 32. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses serve to invoke divine attention before reciting prayers for the sick or dying. | Cf. Psalm 46:8 — This verse from Psalms emphasizes divine protection. In the context of prayers for the sick, it reassures that God's protective presence remains with the afflicted person. | Cf. Psalm 84:13 — This verse affirms the blessedness of trusting in God even during illness or approaching death, reinforcing the spiritual focus of Ma'avar Yabok's approach to end-of-life care. | Cf. Psalm 20:10 — This verse is a plea for divine salvation, particularly appropriate in the context of prayers for the critically ill. | Cf. Psalm 32:7 — This verse portrays God as a protective hiding place during trouble, offering comfort to those experiencing illness or approaching death. | Cf. Isaiah 26:4 — This verse encourages perpetual trust in God as an everlasting foundation, particularly relevant for those facing mortality. | Cf. Psalm 29:11 — This verse promises divine strength and peace, comforting concepts for both the sick person and those caring for them. | Cf. Talmudic and Kabbalistic tradition — The concluding formula about the four archangels surrounding a person with the Divine Presence above appears frequently in Jewish protective prayers. In Ma'avar Yabok, this formula creates a spiritual shield around the ill or dying person, invoking angelic protection from all directions.

[ii]Cf. Zohar, Parashat Vayakhel — The Zohar typically interprets this verse mystically, explaining how divine teachings flow downward like rain from higher spiritual realms to nourish the lower worlds, just as rain descends from heaven to nourish the earth. | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:2 — The abbreviated phrase 'יערוף כמטר וגו' (may my teaching drop like rain, etc.) refers to the full verse 'May my teaching drop like rain, my speech distill as dew, like gentle rain on tender grass, and like showers on the herb.' This is a common liturgical device in Ma'avar Yabok, where the opening of a verse is cited with the expectation that the reader would mentally complete it.

הראשונים הם כ״א במספר אך טוב לישראל[v][vi] These are the first, 21 in number,[4] [corresponding to] "But good for Israel"[5]

[1]These are specific psalms that have been identified as particularly appropriate for recitation at the bedside of someone who is ill or dying. Psalm 23 is the well-known 'The LORD is my shepherd' psalm, often recited for comfort in difficult times. Psalm 25 is a prayer for divine guidance and forgiveness. Psalm 30 is a song of thanksgiving for recovery from grave illness. Psalm 32 expresses the joy of receiving divine forgiveness.

[2]The text is referring to a previously provided list of recommended psalms that are suitable for recitation at the bedside of the ill or dying. This instruction allows flexibility in choosing which psalms to recite, while still directing the reader to select from those that have been specifically identified as appropriate for this ritual context.

[3]This simple heading has profound significance in the context of Ma'avar Yabok. It marks the beginning of 112 carefully selected biblical verses that were to be recited for someone approaching death. The numerical value of YaBOK (יב״ק) equals 112, and these verses are divided into groups corresponding to divine names (21 for Ehyeh, 26 for YHVH, and 65 for Adnut), creating a comprehensive spiritual framework for the soul's transition.

[4]The text is introducing the first group of biblical verses in a structured collection of 112 verses that will be recited for someone who is dying. These 21 verses correspond to the divine name אהי״ה (Ehyeh), which has the numerical value of 21.

[5]The phrase 'אך טוב לישראל' (But good for Israel) serves as a thematic title for this first set of verses

[i]The text lists specific psalm numbers that are recommended for recitation: Psalm 23 ('The LORD is my shepherd'), Psalm 25 ('To You, O LORD, I lift up my soul'), Psalm 30 ('I will extol You, O LORD'), and Psalm 32 ('Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven'). These psalms were selected for their themes of divine protection, guidance, healing, and forgiveness, making them especially appropriate for deathbed contexts.

[ii]This phrase refers to psalms that have been previously marked or designated in the text as suitable for recitation at the bedside of the ill or dying. Ma'avar Yabok includes extensive lists of appropriate psalms and prayers organized for specific ritual contexts.

[iii]This heading marks the beginning of the central 112 biblical verses that are organized into groups corresponding to divine names. The acronym YaBOK (יב״ק) serves both as a reference to the book's title (Crossing of the Jabbok) and as a mnemonic for the verses' spiritual purpose in facilitating the soul's transition.

[iv]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The acronym YaBOK (יב״ק) refers to both the title of the book (Ma'avar Yabok/Crossing of the Yabok) and to the specific 112 verses that follow, which are divided into groups corresponding to divine names. These verses were meant to be recited for someone transitioning from life to death, facilitating the soul's peaceful journey. | Cf. Genesis 32:22-32 — The YaBOK verses allude to Jacob's transformative crossing of the Jabbok River, which serves as the central metaphor for the entire book—representing the soul's transition from this world to the next.

[v]This line introduces the first set of 21 biblical verses in a collection of 112 verses arranged according to divine names. The phrase 'אך טוב לישראל' (But good for Israel) serves both as a reference to Psalm 73:1 and as a thematic title for this set of verses. The number 21 corresponds to the numerical value of the divine name אהי״ה (Ehyeh).

[vi]Cf. Psalm 73:1 — The text is indicating that the 21 verses that follow correspond to the divine name אהי״ה (Ehyeh), which has the numerical value of 21. The phrase 'But good for Israel' serves as both a reference to Psalm 73 and as a thematic introduction to these verses, which are intended to bring divine goodness and protection to the sick or dying person. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The text indicates that these are the first 21 verses of a collection of 112 biblical verses organized according to divine names (21 for אהי״ה, 26 for יהו״ה, and 65 for אדנו״ת). The numerical value of YaBOK (יב״ק) equals 112, which is the total number of verses compiled in this section to aid the soul's transition at death.

And it came between the camp of Egypt and the camp of Israel; and there was the cloud and the darkness, yet it gave light by night; and the one came not near the other all the night. And Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the LORD caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all the night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided.[2]

[A] Or: "For Your salvation I wait, O LORD [to be recited forward, then backward, then forward again]: For Your redemption I hope, O LORD [to be recited forward, then backward, then forward again]" — The Hebrew 'ישר הפוך ישר' appears to be instructions for how to recite the verse rather than part of the verse itself. This alternative makes the instructional nature of these words clearer to a modern reader.

[B] Or: "a camp of God" — The Hebrew lacks the definite article, so 'a camp of God' might be more literal, though 'God's camp' flows better in English.

[C] Or: "and he called the name of that place Mahanaim [Two Camps]" — Adding the translation of 'Mahanaim' as 'Two Camps' would help readers understand the significance of the name, which relates to the encounter with the divine host joining the human company.

and is the opening of Psalm 73:1. This collection of verses is designed to bring divine protection and aid to the dying person's soul as it transitions from this world.

[1] The recognition of divine presence at critical transition points is a central theme in Ma'avar Yabok. Just as Jacob recognized God's presence at Mahanaim during his journey, those attending the dying are encouraged to recognize the sacred nature of the death transition.

[2] These verses are specifically selected for their imagery of divine protection during transitions.

[i] This verse comes from Genesis 49:18, part of Jacob's deathbed blessings to his sons. Its use here creates a powerful connection between Jacob's approaching death and the situation of the dying person for whom these verses are being recited.

[ii] These words are not part of the biblical verse but rather instructions for how to recite the verse: first forward (in normal order), then backward (in reverse order), then forward again. This technique of repetition with variation was considered to have special spiritual power.

[iii] The name 'Mahanaim' means 'Two Camps' in Hebrew, referring to Jacob's camp meeting the divine camp (the angels). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this name takes on special significance as it symbolizes the meeting point between the earthly and heavenly realms during the soul's transition.

[iv] The parting of the waters serves as a powerful metaphor for the soul's transition at death—just as the Israelites passed through the divided sea from one state of existence to another, so does the soul pass from life to the afterlife.

[v] Cf. Genesis 32:1-2 — The reference to Jacob's encounter with angels at Mahanaim is particularly significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, as the book's title directly references Jacob's crossing of the Yabok River. Here it establishes a parallel between Jacob's journey with divine protection and the soul's journey in transition from life to death. | Cf. Genesis 15:15 — The verse 'And you shall go to your fathers in peace; you shall be buried in a good old age' was originally God's

The parting of the Red Sea serves as a powerful metaphor for the soul's passage from life to death—a journey through a seemingly impassable barrier that becomes possible through divine intervention.

[1]The Hebrew text establishes a theological framework where the same God who judges and legislates also provides salvation, offering reassurance to the dying person that divine judgment is tempered with mercy.

[2]This familiar image of strength renewal and soaring is particularly appropriate in death contexts, representing the soul's liberation from physical constraints and its ability to ascend to spiritual realms.

promise to Abraham. In this context, it's repurposed as a comforting assurance for the dying person, suggesting that death can be peaceful and a natural completion of life. | Cf. Exodus 14:19-21 — The verses describing the angel of God and the pillar of cloud protecting Israel, followed by Moses parting the Red Sea, create a powerful metaphor for divine protection during transitions. Just as God protected Israel during their transition from Egypt to freedom, these verses suggest God will protect the soul during its transition from life to death. | Cf. Genesis 49:18 — The opening line 'For Your salvation I wait, O LORD' comes from Jacob's deathbed blessings to his sons, making it especially appropriate in a deathbed context. It expresses hope and trust in divine salvation even at the moment of death.

[i]The phrase 'open the gates' takes on particular significance in the context of death rituals, where it can be understood as referring to the gates of the heavenly realm opening to receive the soul of the departed.

[ii]The text employs three distinct terms for peaceful dwelling places, potentially corresponding to the three levels of the soul (nefesh, ruach, and neshamah) in kabbalistic thought, each finding its appropriate resting place in the afterlife.

[iii]The Hebrew phrase 'ya'alu ever' (they shall mount up with wings) uses imagery of ascent that resonates with the soul's upward journey after death. The eagle metaphor suggests both power and transcendence.

[iv]The doubling of 'anochi' (I) creates emphasis and suggests absolute divine authority in the act of forgiveness, particularly meaningful in the context of deathbed confessions.

[v]Cf. Isaiah 33:22 — This verse establishes God as the ultimate authority in three roles: judge, lawgiver, and king. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this serves to comfort the dying by reminding them that the same God who judges also saves, offering reassurance that divine judgment is tempered with mercy. | Cf. Isaiah 26:2 — This verse envisions gates opening for the righteous, which in the context of a deathbed ritual represents the soul's passage to the afterlife. The emphasis on faithfulness suggests that proper spiritual preparation ensures smooth transition after death. | Cf. Isaiah 32:18 — This verse promises peaceful dwellings and secure rest, serving as a reassurance that the soul of the departed will find tranquility after death. The three terms for restful places (peaceful habitations, secure dwellings, quiet resting places) may correspond to different levels of the soul's repose in the afterlife. | Cf. Isaiah 40:31 — This familiar verse

[A] Or: "With me from Lebanon, O bride, with me from Lebanon you shall journey; you shall look down from the peak of Amana, from the summit of Senir and Hermon, from the lairs of lions, from the mountains of leopards." — This alternate translation varies some of the vocabulary choices for more precise contextual meaning, particularly using 'journey' instead of 'come' and 'lairs' instead of 'dens' for the lion habitations. It also reverses 'summit' and 'peak' to better reflect the Hebrew terms.

[1] The Hebrew term 'ge'alticha' (I have redeemed you) carries connotations of both redemption and kinship obligation, suggesting that God acts as a redeemer not only out of mercy but also out of covenantal responsibility.

[2] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, the 'beloved' (dodi) is understood as God, and this passage represents the divine call to the soul at the moment of death. What follows is God's invitation to the soul to depart from the body and ascend to the spiritual realms.

[3] This tender call from the beloved (God) to the soul takes on profound significance in the context of deathbed rituals. It reframes death not as abandonment but as a loving invitation from God to the soul to depart from its earthly vessel and journey to spiritual realms.

about renewed strength and soaring like eagles is reimagined in the context of death as describing the soul's liberation from the constraints of the physical body, able to ascend freely without the weariness that characterized earthly existence. | Cf. Isaiah 43:2 — The imagery of safely passing through waters and fire represents the soul's journey through the transitional states after death. In kabbalistic thought, these elements often symbolize the purifying processes the soul undergoes, with divine protection ensuring safe passage. | Cf. Isaiah 43:25 — This verse about God blotting out transgressions relates directly to the deathbed confession (vidui) emphasized throughout Ma'avar Yabok. The repeated 'I' (anochi anochi) emphasizes that only God has the ultimate power to forgive sins. | Cf. Isaiah 44:22 — The image of sins being blotted out like clouds completes the forgiveness theme, with the call to return (shuvah) connecting to the concept of teshuvah (repentance) that Ma'avar Yabok emphasizes as essential preparation for death.

[i] The repetition of 'with me from Lebanon' emphasizes the divine call to the soul. In the mystical context of Ma'avar Yabok, Lebanon (which means 'white' in Hebrew) represents the realm of purification that the soul must pass through on its journey after death.

[ii] The 'dens of lions' and 'mountains of leopards' are traditionally interpreted in Jewish mysticism as representing spiritual dangers or accusers that the soul encounters after death. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses take on special significance as they describe the soul's journey from places of spiritual danger to divine embrace.

[iii] In Kabbalistic imagery, God's left hand represents the attribute of judgment (gevurah) while His right hand represents loving-kindness (chesed). This verse suggests that the soul is embraced by both divine justice and mercy, with mercy (the right hand) ultimately embracing and predominating.

[iv] The north and south winds in Kabbalistic interpretation represent different spiritual forces. The north wind is associated with severity and judgment, while the south wind represents kindness and mercy. The call for both winds suggests a balanced spiritual awakening that will allow the soul's inherent qualities (the garden's spices) to be fully expressed.

[A] Or: "Awaken, O north wind, and come, O south wind! Breathe upon my garden, that its fragrances may flow forth. May my beloved enter his garden and eat its precious fruits." — This alternative more precisely captures the sensual imagery of the Hebrew with 'breathe upon' rather than 'blow upon', 'fragrances' rather than 'spices', and 'precious fruits' rather than 'choice fruits'. The phrase 'flow forth' better conveys the imagery of fragrance dispersal than simply 'flow'.

[1] This final verse from Psalm 3 is particularly meaningful in the context of Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed rituals, as it reframes death as a form of sleep from which one will awaken through divine support. The verse offers comfort by suggesting that death is not final extinction but a transition to be followed by awakening through God's sustaining power.

[2] The Hebrew term 'יאמר' indicates a formal recitation in a liturgical context, not merely casual speaking. This is a directive for the person leading prayers for the sick or dying person.

[3] These specific psalms are recommended because of their thematic relevance to situations of illness

[i] Cf. Song of Songs — This passage quotes directly from Song of Songs, a text traditionally read as an allegory for the love between God and Israel. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses from Song of Songs represent the divine beloved (God) calling to the soul to arise and journey from this world to the next. The garden imagery represents the Garden of Eden where the soul will find rest after death. | Cf. Psalm 5:7-8 — The verse 'And I, through Your abundant loving-kindness, will enter Your house...' is a direct quote from Psalm 5:7-8. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm verse is repurposed as a prayer for the soul to be admitted to God's heavenly dwelling after death through divine mercy rather than personal merit. | Cf. Psalm 18:17 — The verse 'Deliver me from my strong enemy, and from those who hate me, for they are too mighty for me' is from Psalm 18:17. In the deathbed context of Ma'avar Yabok, these enemies can be understood as the Angel of Death or other spiritual accusers that might impede the soul's peaceful transition. | Cf. Psalm 3:5 — The final verse 'I lay down and slept; I awoke, for the LORD sustains me' comes from Psalm 3:5. In the Ma'avar Yabok context, this verse takes on profound significance as it reframes death as a form of sleep from which the soul will awaken through divine support, metaphorically pointing to the hope of resurrection. | Cf. Zohar — The Zohar interprets the Song of Songs as describing the soul's ascent through various spiritual levels. The mountains mentioned (Lebanon, Amana, Senir, Hermon) are understood as spiritual obstacles the soul must overcome in its journey. The 'dens of lions' and 'mountains of leopards' represent dangerous spiritual forces or accusers that the soul must navigate past.

[ii] Cf. Divine name Ehyeh (אהי״ה) — The divine name Ehyeh (אהי״ה) comes from God's self-revelation to Moses at the burning bush where God says 'Ehyeh asher Ehyeh' (I am who I am). In Kabbalah, this name has the numerical value of 21 (א=1, ה=5, י=10, ה=5) and is associated with the divine attribute of Keter (Crown), the highest sefirah. The 21 verses that follow are meant to be recited at the deathbed and are grouped according to divine names to facilitate the soul's transition. | Cf. YaBOK verses — This is part of a larger collection of 112 verses organized into three groups corresponding to three divine names: 21 verses for Ehyeh (אהי״ה), 26 verses for the Tetragrammaton (YHVH), and 65 verses for Adnut (אדנו״ת). Together they total 112 verses, which equals the numerical value of YaBOK (יב״ק). These verses are meant to be recited to assist the soul's transition at death.

[iii] This is a liturgical instruction indicating what should be recited at this point in the deathbed ritual. The term 'יאמר' (he shall say/recite) appears frequently throughout Ma'avar Yabok as a directive for prayer leaders or those attending to the sick.

[A] Or: "And the LORD was going before them by day in a pillar of cloud" — The Hebrew uses the present participle form (הֹלֵךְ) which can be translated as 'was going' to better convey the continuous action. This might be preferable if emphasizing the ongoing nature of divine guidance.

[B] Or: "Look, I am sending an angel ahead of you" — The translation of 'הִנֵּה' as 'Look' and 'לְפָנֶיךָ' as 'ahead of you' might be clearer in modern English, though the traditional 'Behold' has a more formal, liturgical quality appropriate to this context.

or approaching death. Psalm 42 expresses yearning for God despite feeling abandoned, Psalm 43 continues this theme with a plea for vindication and guidance, and Psalm 51 is David's profound confession after his sin with Bathsheba—making it particularly appropriate for deathbed confession contexts.

[1] This flexibility indicates that Ma'avar Yabok presents recommended practices rather than rigid requirements. The text acknowledges that different situations might call for different selections from the previously listed psalms, allowing the prayer leader to exercise judgment based on the specific circumstances.

[2] The sacrificial imagery serves as a metaphor for death as a form of sacred offering. In kabbalistic thought, the righteous person's death is considered a form of atonement with cosmic significance similar to Temple sacrifices.

[i] These psalm numbers refer to specific chapters in the Book of Psalms that are considered particularly appropriate in the context of illness or approaching death. Psalm 42 expresses spiritual longing ('As a deer pants for flowing streams, so pants my soul for you, O God'), Psalm 43 is a plea for divine vindication and guidance, and Psalm 51 is a profound penitential prayer seeking forgiveness and purification.

[ii] This phrase indicates flexibility in the ritual, allowing the leader to choose from previously mentioned psalms according to what seems most appropriate for the specific situation. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's approach of providing structured guidance while allowing for adaptation based on individual circumstances.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's other psalm recommendations — Throughout the 'Seder' section of Ma'avar Yabok, the author recommends various psalms for recitation in contexts of illness and approaching death. These are organized into eight distinct liturgical sequences, with some psalms appearing in multiple sequences. The instruction here reflects the book's approach of providing structured options while allowing flexibility in their application. | Cf. Yom Kippur liturgy — The inclusion of Psalm 51 connects to the Jewish tradition of confession (vidui), which is central to Yom Kippur liturgy. Ma'avar Yabok frequently draws parallels between deathbed confession and Yom Kippur practices, suggesting that proper preparation for death should mirror the spiritual purification sought on the Day of Atonement.

[iv] This verse from Exodus 13:21 describes God's guidance of the Israelites in the wilderness through visible manifestations. In Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as a metaphor for divine guidance during the soul's journey after death.

[v] This verse from Exodus 23:20 is included to emphasize the belief that angels guide and protect the soul during its transition after death. The concept of angelic escorts for the departing soul is a significant theme in Ma'avar Yabok.

[vi] This verse from Leviticus 1:11 regarding sacrifice is included to establish a metaphorical connection between Temple sacrifices and death. In kabbalistic thought, the proper death of a righteous person is considered a form of sacrifice that achieves spiritual atonement.

[A] Or: "And the priest shall effect expiation for him before the LORD, and he shall be forgiven" — The term 'expiation' for 'כִּפֶּר' might more precisely capture the ritual act of removing impurity, though 'atonement' is more widely understood and conventional in English translations.

[B] Or: "A perpetual fire shall be kindled on the altar; it must not be extinguished" — This alternate translation emphasizes the command nature of the instruction with 'must not' and uses 'perpetual' for 'תָּמִיד' which directly connects to the concept of eternality central to the metaphorical meaning in this context.

[1] This verse metaphorically connects to the ritual washing and dressing of the deceased in burial shrouds (tachrichim). The changing of garments symbolizes the soul's transition from one state of existence to another.

[2] This verse from the Yom Kippur service connects death to the ultimate moment of spiritual purification. Ma'avar Yabok suggests that proper deathbed practices can achieve a complete cleansing of the soul before its journey to the next world.

[i] This verse from Leviticus 4:26 emphasizes the theme of atonement through ritual, paralleling Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on deathbed confession (vidui) as a means of achieving spiritual purification before death.

[ii] This verse from Leviticus 6:4 about changing garments connects metaphorically to the ritual washing and dressing of the deceased in burial shrouds (tachrichim), suggesting that these practices have a spiritual significance similar to Temple rituals.

[iii] This verse from Leviticus 6:6 about the eternal flame is included to symbolize the eternal nature of the soul. While the body may perish, the soul continues eternally, like the flame that must never be extinguished.

[iv] This verse from Leviticus 16:30 regarding Yom Kippur connects to the concept that death, when approached with proper spiritual preparation, can serve as a final purification of the soul. The comparison between death and Yom Kippur appears in rabbinic literature.

[v] Cf. Exodus 13:21-22 — The verse about the pillar of cloud and fire is quoted here to symbolize divine guidance for the soul's journey. In Ma'avar Yabok, this represents how God provides spiritual illumination and protection for the soul during its transition from life to death. | Cf. Exodus 23:20 — The reference to God sending an angel establishes the concept of angelic escorts. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this represents the belief that angels accompany the soul on its journey after death, providing guidance and protection. | Cf. Leviticus 1:11 — The sacrificial imagery serves as a metaphor for the dying person's soul being offered to God. In Ma'avar Yabok, this connects to the idea that proper deathbed rituals transform death into a sacred offering. | Cf. Leviticus 4:31 — The atonement verse reflects Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on deathbed confession (vidui) as a means of spiritual purification before death, suggesting that proper rituals can cleanse the soul of sin. | Cf. Leviticus 6:4 — The changing of garments connects to Ma'avar Yabok's descriptions of preparing the deceased's body, suggesting that the ritual washing and dressing of the dead has spiritual significance similar to Temple rituals. | Cf. Leviticus 6:6 — The eternal flame on the altar symbolizes the enduring soul. In Ma'avar Yabok, this connects to the belief that

[1]This opening line combines elements of several biblical passages but isn't an exact quote from any single verse. It serves as a blessing for the soul's journey, similar to how God sent Jacob (Israel) on his journey in Genesis.

[2]The image of God as both leading from the front ('goes before you') and protecting from behind ('rear guard') creates a complete envelope of divine protection for the departing soul, symbolizing safety on all sides during the perilous transition from life to death.

[3]In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these weapons represent spiritual accusations, demonic forces, or other metaphysical obstacles that might impede the soul's journey after death. The verse functions as a protective spiritual formula.

[4]This verse from Isaiah's 'Suffering Servant' passage is given new context in Ma'avar Yabok, suggesting that righteous suffering before death has atoning power, potentially easing the soul's journey after death.

[5]This powerful image of silent acceptance before slaughter provides a spiritual model for facing death with dignity and without protest, a virtue emphasized throughout Ma'avar Yabok's guidance for the dying.

while the body perishes, the soul continues eternally, maintained by divine light. | Cf. Leviticus 7:37 — This verse summarizing different offerings connects to Ma'avar Yabok's comprehensive approach to end-of-life rituals, suggesting that proper practices create a complete spiritual system for the soul's transition. | Cf. Leviticus 16:30 — The Yom Kippur verse connects to Ma'avar Yabok's understanding of death as the ultimate moment of spiritual purification, suggesting that proper deathbed practices can achieve a final cleansing of the soul before it departs.

[i]This opening verse resembles 1 Samuel 17:37 but isn't identical to any biblical verse. It appears to be a liturgical adaptation combining elements from several biblical passages, serving as an invocation of divine accompaniment for the departing soul.

[ii]The Hebrew term מְאַסִּפְכֶם (your gatherer/rear guard) carries dual significance in this context: it refers both to God as the one who gathers souls after death and as the protector who guards the rear of the procession, ensuring safe passage through the spiritual realms.

[iii]In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse takes on special significance as a protective formula against malevolent spiritual forces that might attack the soul during its journey after death. The "weapons" become metaphors for spiritual accusations or obstacles.

[iv]This verse from Isaiah 53:6 is traditionally interpreted in Jewish mysticism as referring to the righteous who bear suffering that atones for others. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it provides a framework for understanding the spiritual purpose of suffering before death.

[v]The image of the silent sheep before its shearers becomes, in Ma'avar Yabok, a spiritual paradigm for how one should face death—with dignified acceptance rather than protest, following the model of the righteous who trust divine judgment even in suffering.

[vi]In kabbalistic interpretation, this instruction to "enlarge your tent" refers to the expansion of the soul's capacity as it transitions from the constraints of physical existence to the expansiveness of spiritual realms after death.

2755 יַטּוּ אֶל תַּחְשֻׁכִי הַאֲרִיכִי מֵיתָרַיִךְ

Peace shall come and they shall rest on their beds,[3] each one walking in his uprightness. And the LORD will guide you continually, and satisfy your soul in drought, and strengthen your bones; you shall be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters do not fail."[4] 2935R 2940R

[1]In the context of death rituals, this metaphor of expansion represents the soul breaking free from bodily constraints and expanding into spiritual realms, capable of receiving greater divine light and blessing.

[2]This imagery of cosmic celebration represents the joyful reception of the righteous soul by all creation as it transitions from earthly constraints to heavenly freedom—a stark contrast to the somber human experience of death.

[3]The 'beds' here euphemistically refer to graves, but in Ma'avar Yabok's spiritual framework, they become places of peaceful rest rather than corruption—emphasizing that for the righteous, death brings tranquility rather than terror.

[4]This concluding metaphor of unfailing waters represents the eternal spiritual sustenance the

[i]The cosmic celebration described here—mountains singing and trees clapping—represents in Ma'avar Yabok's mystical framework the joyful reception of the righteous soul by the natural world as it ascends to higher realms.

[ii]This verse from Isaiah 57:2 is particularly apt in a deathbed context, as it directly addresses the state of the righteous after death—finding peace and rest in their "beds" (a euphemism for graves), having walked uprightly in life.

[iii]These final metaphors of the watered garden and unfailing spring represent, in Ma'avar Yabok's spiritual framework, the soul's eternal nourishment in Gan Eden (Paradise), where divine sustenance never ceases.

[iv]Cf. Isaiah 52:12 — This verse about not leaving in haste is from Isaiah's prophecy of redemption. In Ma'avar Yabok, it's repurposed to describe the soul's journey after death—suggesting that unlike the traumatic departure from Egypt (in haste/chipazon), the righteous soul's departure should be peaceful and orderly, guided by divine presence. | Cf. Isaiah 54:17 — This verse about no weapon prospering against the faithful appears in Ma'avar Yabok as a protective spiritual formula. It's recited to create a metaphysical shield around the departed soul, protecting it from accusers and negative forces during its journey after death. | Cf. Isaiah 53:6-7 — These verses from Isaiah's 'Suffering Servant' passage are included to provide a model for accepting death with silent dignity. The comparison to a sheep led to slaughter offers the dying person a paradigm for surrendering to divine judgment without complaint, following a pattern that Jewish mystics saw as enabling spiritual atonement through one's suffering. | Cf. Isaiah 54:2 — This verse about enlarging one's tent becomes a mystical metaphor in Ma'avar Yabok for expanding the soul's capacity to receive divine light after death. The physical imagery of tent-expansion is reinterpreted as spiritual expansion, where the soul's limitations fall away as it enters celestial realms. | Cf. Isaiah 55:12 — This joyful verse about going forth with joy and peace is recontextualized in Ma'avar Yabok to describe the soul's journey after death. While originally about the return from exile, here it becomes a vision of the soul's departure from bodily constraints into spiritual freedom, accompanied by cosmic celebration. | Cf. Isaiah 57:2 — This verse about the righteous finding peace in death is particularly apt in Ma'avar Yabok. It directly addresses the state of the departed, suggesting that righteous souls find immediate peace and rest after death, offering comfort to both the dying and their mourners. | Cf. Isaiah 58:11 — This verse about divine guidance and nourishment becomes, in Ma'avar Yabok, a promise of eternal spiritual sustenance for the departed soul. The metaphors of the watered garden and unfailing spring represent the soul's continuous nourishment in the Garden of Eden after death.

For You will light my lamp; the LORD my God will illuminate my darkness. The cords of death encompassed me,[1] and the torrents of wickedness terrified me. The cords of the grave surrounded me; the snares of death confronted me. He will reach down from on high and take me; He will draw me out of many waters.[2] Do not gather my soul with sinners, nor my life with men of bloodshed. I shall walk in my integrity; redeem me and be gracious to me. Do not hide Your face from me; do not turn away Your servant in anger. You have been my help; do not forsake me nor abandon me, O God of my salvation. One thing I have asked of the LORD, that I will seek: that I may dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the LORD and to inquire in His temple.[3] The LORD redeems the soul of His servants, and none who take refuge in Him will be condemned.

הם כ״ו[v] פסוקים כמספר

These are 26 verses corresponding to the numerical righteous soul receives in Gan Eden (Paradise), contrasting with the limitations and deprivations of physical existence.

[1]This passage begins with stark acknowledgment of mortality, followed by divine rescue, then requests not to be gathered with sinners, and culminates in the aspiration to dwell in God's house. This spiritual progression reflects Ma'avar Yabok's approach to guiding the dying from fear to hope.

[2]The imagery of divine rescue from overwhelming waters would be particularly meaningful to those facing death, representing God's power to save the soul from the engulfing forces of mortality.

[3]In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed prayers, this aspiration to behold divine beauty represents the soul's ultimate hope after death—to experience direct divine presence, often associated in kabbalistic thought with the supernal Temple.

[i]The image of 'cords of death' (chevlei mavet) represents the physical and spiritual pain experienced during dying. In kabbalistic thought, these 'cords' are negative spiritual forces that attempt to claim the departing soul.

[ii]The metaphor of 'many waters' (mayim rabim) in kabbalistic literature represents the spiritual forces that might impede the soul's ascent after death. This verse expresses confidence that God will rescue the soul from these obstructing forces.

[iii]This famous verse from Psalm 27 takes on special significance in the context of approaching death, expressing the ultimate desire of the righteous person to experience divine presence in the afterlife, analogous to dwelling in the Temple.

[iv]Cf. Psalm 18:28-30 — These verses are taken directly from Psalm 18, which deals with divine deliverance from death. In Ma'avar Yabok, they serve as a source of comfort for the dying person, expressing confidence that God can illuminate even the darkness of death. | Cf. Psalm 26:9-11 — These verses from Psalm 26 express the psalmist's plea not to be gathered with sinners in death. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, they represent the dying person's request for divine mercy during judgment after death. | Cf. Psalm 27:4, 9 — These verses from Psalm 27 express the desire to dwell in God's house and behold divine beauty. In Ma'avar Yabok, this represents the soul's aspiration to experience divine presence after death. | Cf. Psalm 34:22 — This verse from Psalm 34 offers reassurance that God redeems souls. In the context of deathbed rituals in Ma'avar Yabok, it provides comfort regarding divine redemption beyond death. | Cf. Zohar III:88a — The Zohar discusses how the soul leaving the body fears the 'many waters' (spiritual forces that might impede its ascent). The verse 'He will draw me out of many waters' would resonate with this kabbalistic concept of the soul needing divine assistance during its transition.

[v]The Hebrew letters kaf-vav (כ״ו) represent the number 26.

[A]Or: "There are 26 verses corresponding to the numerical value of the divine Name" — This alternative translation explicitly uses 'divine Name' instead of the transliteration 'YHVH', which might be preferable in contexts where uttering or writing the divine name is considered sensitive. However, the original translation is more precise as it directly transliterates the Hebrew term.

[B]Or: "We beseech You, by the strength of Your mighty right hand, untie the bound." — This alternate translation emphasizes the supplicatory nature of 'אָנָּא' as 'we beseech You' and renders 'תַּתִּיר צְרוּרָה' more literally as 'untie the bound' rather than 'release the bound'.

[C]Or: "protect them like the apple of the eye" — This alternate translation uses the more common English idiom 'apple of the eye' which closely parallels the Hebrew metaphor of 'כְּבָבַת' referring to something precious that requires special protection.

[D]Or: "You who know hidden things" — This alternate translation renders 'תַּעֲלוּמוֹת' as 'hidden

[1]The phrase 'those who seek Your unity' (דּוֹרְשֵׁי יִחוּדֶךָ) has particular significance in Jewish mysticism, referring to those who engage in the spiritual practice of 'yichud' (unification)—meditating on divine unity and working to manifest this unity in their devotional practice.

[i]This refers to the Tetragrammaton (YHVH), the four-letter divine name whose numerical value (gematria) equals 26: Yod (10) + Hei (5) + Vav (6) + Hei (5) = 26.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This brief statement is part of a larger organizational structure where biblical verses are arranged in groups corresponding to divine names. Just before this passage, a collection of 21 verses corresponding to the divine name Ehyeh (אהי״ה) was presented, and this statement introduces the next group of 26 verses corresponding to YHVH. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This explicitly connects to memory note #646 which states 'The numerical value of the Tetragrammaton (יהו״ה) is 26, which explains why exactly 26 verses are included in this section.' This confirms that the numerical correspondence is deliberate and structured. | Cf. Memory Note #623 — This connects to memory note #623 which explains the overall structure: 'The 112 verses in this section are organized into three groups corresponding to divine names: 21 for אהי״ה (Ehyeh), 26 for יהו״ה (YHVH), and 65 for אדנו״ת (Adnut), totaling 112 verses—matching the numerical value of יב״ק (YaBOK).'

[iii]This is the opening line of a mystical prayer known as 'Ana Bekoach,' attributed to the 1st-century sage Rabbi Nehunya ben HaKanah. The prayer consists of 42 words (excluding the final line of 'Baruch Shem') which correspond to what kabbalists call the 42-letter name of God.

[iv]This line contains an acrostic for the divine name 'שקוצית' (ShKVTzYT), continuing the pattern of the entire prayer where the first letter of each word in each line forms one of the components of the 42-letter divine name.

[v]This closing line ('Blessed be the name of His glorious kingdom forever and ever') is not part of the 42-letter name formula but serves as a concluding response similar to its use after the first line of the Shema prayer.

[vi]Cf. Zohar — This prayer is known as 'Ana Bekoach' and is attributed to the 1st-century sage Rabbi Nehunya ben HaKanah. In kabbalistic tradition, particularly the Zohar, it is considered a powerful mystical formula. The 42 words of this prayer correspond to what kabbalists call the 42-letter name of God. | Cf. Siddur (Jewish prayer book) — This prayer appears in standard Jewish prayer books, often recited during the acceptance of the Sabbath (Kabbalat Shabbat) things' rather than 'secrets' which may better capture the breadth of the Hebrew term referring to all that is concealed from human knowledge.

[1] This formula (בָּרוּךְ שֵׁם כְּבוֹד מַלְכוּתוֹ לְעוֹלָם וָעֶד) is typically recited silently after the first verse of the Shema prayer. Its presence here emphasizes the kabbalistic connection between this prayer and divine unity.

[2] The seraphim are a class of angelic beings whose name derives from the Hebrew root meaning 'burning.' In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this vision of seraphim is significant as it represents the highest form of spiritual beings that the departing soul might encounter on its heavenly journey.

[3] This threefold sanctification, known as the Trisagion or Kedushah, forms a central element in Jewish liturgy. In the context of deathbed rituals, reciting this text helps create a sacred atmosphere that mirrors the heavenly realm the soul is about to enter.

[4] This verse transitions from Isaiah's vision to Ezekiel's. In Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed context, this imagery of being lifted up by a spirit beautifully parallels the soul's imminent journey upward from the body.

service, before the morning Shema prayer, and in other liturgical contexts. In Ma'avar Yabok, it is recommended for recitation during deathbed rituals. | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:10 — The phrase 'כְּבָבַת שָׁמְרֵם' (guard them as the pupil of an eye) alludes to Deuteronomy 32:10 where God is described as guarding Jacob/Israel 'as the pupil of His eye' (יִצְּרֶנְחוּ כְּאִישׁוֹן עֵינוֹ).

[i] The repetition of 'six wings' emphasizes the extraordinary nature of these angelic beings, which have three pairs of wings each for distinct purposes.

[ii] The threefold repetition of 'holy' is understood in Jewish mystical tradition as referring to God's holiness manifesting in all three dimensions: space, time, and soul. In kabbalistic thought, it also corresponds to the three highest divine emanations (sefirot).

[iii] Cf. Isaiah 6:2-3 — This passage is taken directly from Isaiah's throne vision, one of the most important prophetic visions in the Hebrew Bible. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this text serves as a powerful prayer for the dying person, invoking the holiness of God and the celestial worship of angels. The intention is to surround the departing soul with divine sanctity, helping to elevate it toward the heavenly realms. | Cf. Ezekiel 3:12 — This verse from Ezekiel complements Isaiah's vision, creating a complete liturgical formula. In Ma'avar Yabok, this combination of texts creates a spiritual atmosphere where the departing soul is envisioned as being transported (like Ezekiel) into the divine presence, surrounded by the same angelic praise that Isaiah witnessed. | Cf. Kedushah prayer — This combination of verses from Isaiah and Ezekiel forms the basis of the Kedushah prayer in Jewish liturgy. By including this text in the deathbed ritual, Ma'avar Yabok connects the dying person to the daily prayer practice of the community and the eternal heavenly liturgy, suggesting that the soul is transitioning to join in the angelic chorus.

[1]The Priestly Blessing that opens this passage (Numbers 6:24-26) is traditionally recited daily in synagogue prayer but takes on additional significance in Ma'avar Yabok as protection for the soul's journey after death.

[2]This comparison of Israel to a resting lion comes from Balaam's unwilling blessing (Numbers 24:9). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it serves to comfort the dying by suggesting they will rest securely under divine protection.

[i]The Song of the Well contains mystical significance in kabbalistic thought, with the well representing the flow of divine wisdom from higher to lower realms, mirroring the soul's journey after death.

[ii]The Shema prayer holds special significance in Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed rituals, as it was traditionally recited at the moment of death. Kabbalistic interpretation views this declaration of divine unity as creating the optimal spiritual conditions for the soul's departure through a 'divine kiss.'

[1]Recitation of the Shema was a central practice at the moment of death in Jewish tradition, exemplified by Rabbi Akiva, who recited it during his martyrdom. Ma'avar Yabok prescribes its recitation to facilitate the soul's peaceful transition.

[2]The image of 'riding upon high places' appears multiple times in this compilation, creating a motif of spiritual elevation. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this imagery resonates with the book's central metaphor of the soul's upward journey after death.

[3]The Hebrew 'בְּהִתְעַטֵּף עָלַי נַפְשִׁי' literally means 'when my soul was wrapped/covered over me' or

[i]This eagle metaphor appears throughout Ma'avar Yabok as a central image for divine protection during the soul's transition. Just as the eagle carries its young on its wings, God is portrayed as carrying the departing soul safely to its destination.

[ii]Cf. Priestly Blessing — This blessing, originally given by Aaron and his sons, appears here as part of a compilation of protective and healing verses intended for the dying person. In Ma'avar Yabok, it serves to invoke divine protection during the soul's transition. | Cf. Shema prayer — The Shema, Judaism's central declaration of faith, is included here as a deathbed recitation to affirm divine unity at the moment of transition. Ma'avar Yabok emphasizes reciting the Shema at death as facilitating the soul's departure through a 'divine kiss.' | Cf. Eagle metaphor — This metaphor of God as an eagle carrying Israel appears in Ma'avar Yabok to evoke divine protection during the soul's journey after death, reassuring the dying that God will carry their soul as tenderly as an eagle carries its young. | Cf. Song of the Well — This reference to water springing up connects symbolically to purification and spiritual transition, suggesting the soul's journey from the wilderness of life to divine dwelling places (Bamoth). | Cf. Moses' incense offering — This passage about Aaron's incense offering that stopped a plague emphasizes the protective power of proper ritual, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on appropriate deathbed rituals to protect the departing soul. | Cf. Balaam's blessing — These verses from Balaam's unwilling blessing of Israel are included to invoke divine protection, comparing the dying person to Israel lying in safety under divine watch, with promises that those who bless them are blessed.

'when my soul grew faint upon me,' conveying profound spiritual distress. This verse from Jonah's prayer in the fish serves as a powerful model for turning to God even in the extremity of approaching death.

[1]The contrast between temporary celestial lights (sun and moon) and God's eternal illumination provides a powerful metaphor for the transition from physical to spiritual existence, suggesting that what the soul encounters after death is not darkness but greater light.

[2]The Hebrew phrase 'מִדֵּי חֹדֶשׁ בְּחָדְשׁוֹ וּמִדֵּי שַׁבָּת בְּשַׁבַּתּוֹ' emphasizes cyclical, continuous worship. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this suggests that after death, the soul continues to participate in sacred time, maintaining connection with religious rhythms.

[3]The Hebrew uses the betrothal formula 'וְאֵרַשְׂתִּיךְ לִי' three times in succession, emphasizing permanence and multiple dimensions of this spiritual bond. In the context of approaching death, this triple declaration provides powerful reassurance of continued relationship with God.

[4]The Hebrew 'יָשׁוּב יְרַחֲמֵנוּ' can be read as 'He will return to have compassion on us,' suggesting not just renewed mercy but active divine movement toward the soul, particularly relevant in the context of death as God draws near to receive the departing soul.

[5]The Hebrew 'שֶׁמֶשׁ צְדָקָה וּמַרְפֵּא בִּכְנָפֶיהָ' presents a complex metaphorical image combining solar and avian imagery. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this represents divine healing that transcends physical recovery, offering spiritual wholeness to the departing soul.

[i]Cf. Isaiah 58:14 — This verse from Isaiah 58:14 is quoted at the beginning of this compilation to set a tone of spiritual elevation and divine promise. In Ma'avar Yabok, it functions as a metaphor for the soul's ascent from earthly suffering to spiritual heights, offering comfort to the sick or dying person by promising divine sustenance through 'the heritage of Jacob.' | Cf. Amos 4:13 — This verse from Amos establishes God's omnipotence as creator and sovereign over all natural forces. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this reinforces the idea that the God who created all existence also has power over life and death, and thus can be trusted with the soul's transition. | Cf. Jonah 2:8 — This verse from Jonah's prayer in the belly of the fish resonates powerfully in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, as it depicts a soul in extremis finding solace in remembering God. For the dying person, it offers a model of turning to divine memory even when overwhelmed by suffering or fear. | Cf. Isaiah 60:20 — This verse from Isaiah presents a powerful image of eternal divine light replacing the cycles of darkness, symbolizing the end of mourning. In Ma'avar Yabok, this serves to reassure the dying person that though physical life may be ending, they are transitioning to a realm of perpetual divine illumination. | Cf. Isaiah 62:10 — This verse from Isaiah, which originally refers to preparing the way for the exiles to return, is repurposed in Ma'avar Yabok to symbolize the preparation for the soul's journey after death. The imagery of highways being built up and stones cleared away suggests the removal of spiritual obstacles for the departing soul. | Cf. Jeremiah 20:13 — This verse from Jeremiah, celebrating divine rescue from enemies, serves in Ma'avar Yabok as a reminder that God delivers souls from both spiritual and physical threats, offering reassurance at the time of death. | Cf. Isaiah 66:23 — This eschatological verse from Isaiah describes universal worship in messianic times. In Ma'avar Yabok, it offers the dying person a vision of joining in eternal, cyclical worship after death, suggesting continuity rather than cessation of spiritual existence. | Cf. 2 Kings 25:30 — This verse, originally about King Jehoiachin receiving a daily provision from the Babylonian king, is recontextualized in Ma'avar Yabok to suggest divine provision for the soul after death—a reassurance of continued divine care in the next world. | Cf. Ezekiel 3:12 — This verse from Ezekiel's vision is incorporated to depict spiritual elevation and divine glory. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it represents the soul's uplifting at death, carried by divine spirit into the presence of God's glory. | Cf. Hosea 2:19-20 — These verses from Hosea, using marriage imagery to describe God's covenant relationship with Israel, are repurposed in Ma'avar Yabok to depict the soul's eternal union with God after death, described in terms of righteousness, justice, love, mercy, and faithfulness. | Cf. Micah 7:18-20 — These verses from Micah emphasize divine forgiveness and compassion, particularly relevant in Ma'avar Yabok as reassurance for the dying person that their sins will be forgiven and cast away, allowing their soul to transition without the burden of transgressions. | Cf. Malachi 4:2 — This verse from Malachi, with its image of healing wings and renewed vitality, serves in Ma'avar Yabok as a promise of spiritual healing and revitalization after death, contrasting with physical decline. | Cf. Zechariah 9:14 — This verse from Zechariah, depicting divine warrior imagery, is included in Ma'avar Yabok to represent God's power to overcome the forces of death and evil, providing protection for the transitioning soul. | Cf. Zechariah 10:12 — This verse from Zechariah promises divine strengthening for God's people. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it reassures the dying person that even in death, they will continue to be empowered through their connection to God. | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:13-14 — This verse from the Song of Moses recounts God's provision for Israel in the wilderness. In Ma'avar Yabok, it symbolizes the abundance and sweetness that awaits the soul in the world to come, drawn from seemingly impossible sources (honey from rock). | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:39 — This verse from Deuteronomy establishes God's absolute sovereignty over life and death. In Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as a theological foundation for accepting death as part of divine providence, while also affirming God's unique power to heal and eventually resurrect. | Cf. Deuteronomy 33:29 — This verse from Moses' blessing celebrates Israel's unique relationship with God as their savior and protector. In Ma'avar Yabok, it reassures the dying person of their belonging to God's chosen people, with all the spiritual protections and promises that entails, even in death.

"See now that I, even I, am He, and there is no god beside Me; I kill and I make alive; I wound and I heal; and there is none that can deliver out of My hand.[1] Happy are you, O Israel! Who is like you, a 3095R people saved by the LORD, the shield of your help, and the sword of your majesty! Your enemies shall come cringing to you, and you shall tread upon their high places."

[1]This declaration of absolute divine sovereignty, while potentially intimidating in other contexts, functions in Ma'avar Yabok as reassurance that the soul remains in God's possession even through death, with no power able to separate it from divine care.

[2]The imagery of righteousness and justice being illuminated like daylight suggests divine vindication that reveals truth. For a dying person, this offers comfort that their true spiritual worth will be recognized by God.

[3]The Hebrew term 'Sheol' (שְׁאוֹל) refers to the realm of the dead or the grave. This verse offers direct reassurance about divine redemption from death, making it particularly relevant in Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed context.

[4]This verse, which the text instructs to be repeated three times, emphasizes God's merciful nature. The repetition intensifies this message of divine compassion, which would be especially comforting to someone approaching death and concerned about judgment.

[i]This verse from Psalm 37:4 begins the collection of scriptural verses from Writings (Ketuvim), which follows the pattern established earlier of grouping verses from Torah, then Prophets, and finally Writings.

[ii]The word 'Selah' appears frequently in Psalms and is likely a musical or liturgical notation. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as a natural pause in the recitation of verses, perhaps allowing for contemplation of the comforting message about God redeeming from Sheol.

[iii]The instruction to repeat this verse three times is significant. Triple recitation is a common practice in Jewish ritual for emphasizing particularly important passages, especially those related to divine mercy and forgiveness, making it appropriate for this deathbed context.

[iv]While this verse from Proverbs 3:24 originally refers to peaceful sleep in life, in the context of Ma'avar Yabok it takes on additional meaning about peaceful death without fear.

[1]In the original context of Proverbs, this refers to peaceful sleep, but in Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed setting, it takes on the additional meaning of peaceful death, with sleep serving as a common euphemism for death.

[2]The metaphor of being redeemed from 'the pit' (שַׁחַת) represents rescue from death or the grave. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this becomes a prayer for the soul's redemption and spiritual illumination after death.

[3]This concluding verse expresses preference for divine judgment over human judgment. In the context of approaching death, it becomes a prayer to be received into God's merciful hands rather than facing harsh judgment, offering final comfort to the dying person.

[i]This verse from Job 33:28 uses the metaphor of light to represent life and divine presence, creating a powerful image of the soul emerging from death (the pit) to experience spiritual illumination.

[ii]This final verse from 2 Samuel 24:14 serves as a fitting conclusion to this collection, expressing preference for divine judgment over human judgment. In the context of approaching death, it becomes a prayer to be received into God's merciful hands rather than being judged harshly.

[iii]Cf. Psalm 37:4-6 — These verses begin with an invitation to find joy in relationship with God rather than worldly concerns, promising divine fulfillment of righteous desires and vindication. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses comfort the dying by assuring them that God will ultimately reveal the truth of their righteousness. | Cf. Psalm 64:1-2 — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is repurposed from its original meaning about human enemies to refer to spiritual forces that might threaten the soul at death. | Cf. Psalm 49:15 — This verse is particularly significant in the deathbed context of Ma'avar Yabok, as it directly addresses divine redemption from Sheol (the grave), offering reassurance about the soul's fate after death. | Cf. Psalm 65:4 — In Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed context, this verse becomes a prayer that the dying person will be chosen to dwell in God's courts in the afterlife, experiencing divine goodness in the spiritual temple. | Cf. Psalm 78:38 — This verse, repeated three times according to the instruction, emphasizes divine mercy and forgiveness, which would be particularly comforting to someone facing death and concerned about judgment. | Cf. Proverbs 3:23-24 — While originally about the benefits of wisdom in daily life, in Ma'avar Yabok these verses are repurposed as reassurances about peaceful death and spiritual security in the afterlife journey. | Cf. Job 33:28-30 — These verses from Job are particularly appropriate in Ma'avar Yabok as they speak of the soul being saved from 'the pit' (a metaphor for death), offering hope for spiritual illumination beyond physical death. | Cf. 2 Samuel 24:14 — This verse concludes the section by expressing preference for God's mercy over human judgment, which in Ma'avar Yabok's context becomes a plea for the dying person to be judged by divine compassion rather than strict justice.

[1] In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, reciting the first verse of the Torah during the final moments of life creates a powerful spiritual symmetry, suggesting that death is not an end but a return to the divine source of creation.

[2] By concluding with the final verse of the Torah, this prayer selection envelops the dying person within the complete cycle of Torah, providing spiritual protection and comfort. The pairing of the first and last verses of Torah symbolizes completeness and the cyclical nature of existence.

[3] This conditional instruction reflects Jewish legal concerns about reciting certain prayers at night. The Thirteen Attributes of Mercy were traditionally not recited at night except in emergency situations, which is why this text specifies that they can be added only during daytime hours.

[4] The Hebrew term 'kavvanah' (כוונה) refers to the proper spiritual focus or mystical intention that should accompany prayer, particularly in kabbalistic practice. It suggests that these verses should be recited with specific meditative focus described in another text.

[i] Cf. The gematria (numerical value) of the Divine Name אדנו״ת (Adnut) — This notation indicates the completion of exactly 65 biblical verses, which corresponds to the numerical value of the Divine Name אדנו״ת (Adnut). The text organizes 112 verses into three groups corresponding to three Divine Names: 21 for אהי״ה (Ehyeh), 26 for יהו״ה (YHVH), and 65 for אדנו״ת (Adnut). This kabbalistic organization reflects the belief that reciting these specific numbers of verses helps facilitate the soul's transition at death through the power of these Divine Names.

[ii] This is the opening verse of Genesis (Genesis 1:1), the first verse of the Torah.

[iii] This is the final verse of Deuteronomy (Deuteronomy 34:12), the concluding verse of the Torah.

[iv] Cf. Genesis 1:1 — The opening verse of the Torah is included as the first verse in this compilation of scriptural passages for the dying. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse represents the beginning of creation, suggesting a completion of the cosmic cycle as the soul prepares to return to its divine source. | Cf. Deuteronomy 34:12 — This verse, the final verse of the Torah, completes the scriptural frame begun with Genesis 1:1. Together, they envelop the dying person in the entirety of Torah, symbolizing completeness and divine protection through the full cycle of sacred text as the soul transitions.

[v] This term literally means 'great man' and refers to a person of high status, likely a Torah scholar or community leader. The text indicates that additional prayers should be recited for such individuals.

[vi] These are the opening words of Micah 7:18-20, a biblical passage that emphasizes God's forgiveness and compassion: 'Who is a God like You, who pardons iniquity and passes over the transgression of the remnant of His heritage? He does not maintain His anger forever, for He delights in mercy.'

[vii] This refers to the prayer society called 'Illuminators of Dawn' (Me'irei Shachar) with which the author was associated in Modena, Italy. The name suggests they gathered for morning prayers, and the possessive 'our' (שלנו) indicates the author's personal connection to this group.

met him.[1] Behold, I send an angel before you to guard you on the way and to bring you to the place that I have prepared. He shall slaughter the young bull before the LORD, and Aaron's sons the priests shall bring the blood and throw the blood against the sides of the altar that is at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. But its entrails and its legs he shall wash with water, and the priest shall burn all of it on the altar, as a burnt offering, a food offering with a pleasing aroma to the LORD.[2] When anyone brings a grain offering as an offering to the LORD, his offering shall be of fine flour. He shall pour oil on it and put frankincense on it. He shall slaughter it on the north side of the altar before the LORD, and Aaron's sons the priests shall throw its blood against the sides of the altar. This is the portion of Aaron and the portion of his sons from the LORD's food offerings, on the day they were brought near to serve as priests to the LORD. Then Moses brought Aaron and his sons and washed them with water. And he put the tunic on him and tied the sash around his waist and clothed him with the robe and put the ephod on him and tied the skillfully woven band of the ephod around him, binding it to him with it. And he placed the breastpiece on him, and in the breastpiece he put the Urim and the Thummim.[3] And he set the turban on his head, and on the turban, in front, he set the golden plate, the holy crown, as the LORD commanded Moses. Then he poured some of the anointing oil on Aaron's head and anointed him to consecrate him. When the tabernacle is to set out, the Levites shall take it down, and when the tabernacle is to be pitched, the Levites shall set

[1] This opening verse establishes the theme of divine guidance during transitions. In Ma'avar Yabok, Jacob's journey—especially his crossing of the Yabok River—symbolizes the soul's passage from this world to the next.

[2] The sacrificial imagery is deliberately included in this deathbed liturgy to frame death as a sacred offering to God rather than merely a tragic end.

[3] The detailed description of priestly vestments symbolizes how the soul is clothed in spiritual garments in the afterlife, with the Urim and Thummim (devices of divine illumination) representing the soul's enhanced spiritual perception after death.

[i] This opening verse about Jacob meeting angels deliberately connects to the title of Ma'avar Yabok, as Jacob's journey included crossing the Yabok River (Genesis 32), which serves as the central metaphor for the soul's transition at death.

[ii] The inclusion of sacrificial verses from Leviticus reflects the kabbalistic understanding that death itself is a form of sacrifice, with the soul being offered up to God in a process of spiritual purification.

[iii] The priestly vestments are described in detail because they symbolize the soul being clothed in spiritual garments as it transitions to the divine realm, a common motif in kabbalistic texts about death.

thousands of Israel.' See, the LORD your God has set the land before you. Go up, take possession, as the LORD, the God of your fathers, has told you. Do not fear or be dismayed. Please let me go over and see the good land that is beyond the Jordan, 3195R palm of your God. On the mountain height of Israel I will plant it, and it will bear branches and produce fruit and become a noble cedar. And birds of every sort will nest under it; they will nest in the shade of [1] This verse about boundaries in the sacred precinct metaphorically reinforces the separation between the worlds of the living and the dead, which is being crossed during the dying process.

[2] The instruction to repeat this verse three times transforms it into a protective incantation. In Jewish mystical practice, such repetitions are believed to create spiritual shields around the dying person.

[i] This verse about unauthorized access to sacred space is included as a reminder of the boundary between life and death, and the sacred nature of the transition between them.

[ii] The instruction to repeat this verse three times indicates its use as a protective formula. The seraphim imagery connects the dying person to the heavenly realm they are about to enter.

[iii] The notation that these are 26 verses is significant because 26 is the numerical value (gematria) of the divine name YHVH (יהו״ה). This numerical correspondence is believed to invoke divine protection for the departing soul.

[iv] Cf. Genesis 32:1 — This verse begins a compilation of biblical passages intended for recitation

A prayer for the poor when he is faint and pours out his supplication before the LORD: O God, God of [1]This numerical annotation is crucially important, as 26 is the gematria (numerical value) of the divine name YHVH. By reciting exactly 26 verses, the liturgy invokes divine protection through this mystical correspondence.

[2]I've added '[of judgment]' to clarify that this 'heat' is not literal but refers to divine judgment (din), a key kabbalistic concept where the dying person experiences spiritual judgment as their soul prepares to depart.

[3]The Hebrew uses the euphemistic expression 'command of his separation' (פקודת הפרדו) to refer to death. I've rendered this as 'time of his departure' to maintain the euphemistic quality while making the meaning clear in English.

at deathbeds. The reference to Jacob meeting angels is significant because Jacob's crossing of the Jabbok River (which gives the book Ma'avar Yabok its title) represents the soul's transition from this world to the next. | Cf. Exodus 23:20 — This verse about God sending an angel to guard the way is included to invoke divine protection for the dying person's soul during its journey after death. | Cf. Leviticus 1:5 — These sacrificial verses from Leviticus are included as a meditation on the dying person's soul being offered to God, with death understood as a form of sacrifice that atones and purifies. | Cf. Leviticus 8:7-9 — The description of Aaron's priestly vestments symbolizes the soul being clothed in spiritual garments as it transitions to the divine realm, a common kabbalistic motif in Ma'avar Yabok. | Cf. Numbers 4:15 — References to the tabernacle being dismantled and erected symbolize the separation of body and soul at death, followed by the soul's 'erection' or elevation in the heavenly realm. | Cf. Numbers 10:35-36 — These verses recited when the Ark of the Covenant moved are included to facilitate the soul's journey, with divine protection from spiritual adversaries. | Cf. Isaiah 6:2-3 — Isaiah's throne vision is included to help the soul ascend to the divine realm where it will join the angels in perpetual praise, with the instruction to repeat three times indicating its use as a protective formula. | Cf. Isaiah 53:12 — This verse from the Suffering Servant passage is included to provide meaning to suffering before death, suggesting that the dying person's trials have spiritual significance and will lead to divine reward. | Cf. Ezekiel 17:23 — The metaphor of a noble cedar where birds nest represents the soul finding rest in the divine realm after death, with shade symbolizing divine protection. | Cf. Tetragrammaton (Divine Name) — The note that these are 'twenty-six verses' is significant because 26 is the numerical value (gematria) of the divine name YHVH. This collection of verses is designed to invoke divine protection through this specific numerical correspondence.

[i]This phrase literally means 'intense heat' but in this context refers metaphorically to the intense divine judgment (din) that surrounds a dying person. In kabbalistic thought, this 'heat' represents the cosmic forces of judgment that gather around the soul as it prepares to depart.

[ii]Literally 'the command of his separation,' a euphemism for the moment of death when the soul separates from the body.

[iii]A ritual instruction for those attending the dying person to physically lift their faces upward while praying, symbolically directing their supplication toward heaven.

[iv]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, sections on deathbed rituals — This instruction introduces a specific prayer to be recited by those attending a dying person when they perceive that death is imminent, connecting to the book's broader framework of structured spiritual care for the dying. | Cf. Zohar on the soul's departure — The reference to 'intense heat' (חמה עזה) appears to draw on kabbalistic teachings where divine judgment is metaphorically depicted as heat or fire that surrounds the dying person as their soul prepares to depart.

nesses and to save them from their afflictions. (Until 3250R here it is good to recite for most sick people who are likely to recover.) But if it has been decreed by Your righteous court to gather now his spirit and soul to Yourself, and the pangs of death have encompassed him, please, O LORD, deliver his soul. May a spirit 3255R

[A] Or: "May there be added to him a spirit of purity, holiness, and clarity of heart" — The term 'טֹהַר לֵב' might be better rendered as 'clarity of heart' to distinguish it from the earlier 'טָהֳרָה' (purity). This alternate captures the nuance of mental/spiritual clarity as distinct from ritual or moral purity.

[1] This divine title appears in Numbers 16:22 and emphasizes God's sovereignty over human life and death, making it particularly appropriate for deathbed prayers.

[2] The term 'am segulato' refers to Israel as God's chosen or treasured people, appearing in Deuteronomy 7:6 and other passages of the Hebrew Bible.

[i] This reference to 'the fourth gate of the Palace of Brightness' reflects the kabbalistic concept of the seven heavenly palaces (heikhalot) through which souls ascend. The Palace of Brightness (Heikhal HaNogah) is associated with divine healing energy.

[ii] Raphael, whose name means 'God heals' in Hebrew, is traditionally identified as the angel of healing in Jewish tradition. The prayer specifically invokes him from the eastern direction, associated with mercy and healing in kabbalistic cosmology.

[iii] This combines the divine name 'Ehyeh' from Exodus 3:14 with the phrase 'truly God is good to Israel' from Psalm 73:1, creating a kabbalistic formula linking divine essence with healing power.

[iv] This parenthetical instruction indicates that the text until this point is appropriate for those expected to recover, while what follows is more suitable for those approaching death. This practical division shows how Ma'avar Yabok served as a functional manual for deathbed rituals.

[A] Or: "May his soul depart with the 'kiss of death' and with the adhesion of spirit to spirit" — The term 'בִּנְשִׁיקָה' refers to the kabbalistic concept of 'death by divine kiss' (mitat neshikah), considered the most elevated form of death. This alternate more explicitly conveys this mystical concept.

[B] Or: "May he not suffer under the dominion of the Sitra Achra" — The term 'סִטְרָא אַחֲרָא' (Sitra Achra) is a technical kabbalistic term referring to the forces of impurity. Leaving it untranslated maintains the technical specificity of this mystical concept.

[1] This imagery draws on Psalm 104:3 where God is described as making the clouds His chariot. Here it is applied to the soul's ascent after death, visualizing it riding upon clouds toward heaven.
[2] This phrase echoes Numbers 14:17, where Moses appeals to God's power in seeking forgiveness for Israel. In this context, it invokes divine power to assist the soul's transition.
[3] This reference comes from Psalm 104:17. In the context of this prayer, it forms part of a series of natural images from Psalms that metaphorically represent spiritual realities of the afterlife.

[i] This refers to the concept of 'death by divine kiss' (mitat neshikah), considered in rabbinic tradition to be the most elevated form of death, attributed to Moses and other righteous figures. It signifies a painless departure directly facilitated by God rather than by the Angel of Death.
[ii] The phrase 'Sitra Achra' (the Other Side) is a kabbalistic term for the realm of impurity and evil. The prayer asks that the dying person be spared from suffering caused by these negative spiritual forces during the soul's departure.

[A] Or: "May the light of the Supernal White radiance illuminate the four hundred worlds of yearning and divine will" — This alternative better conveys the kabbalistic terminology, where 'לְבֶן הָעֶלְיוֹן' refers to a specific divine emanation, and 'עַלְמִין דְּכְסוּפָא וְרָצוֹן' refers to spiritual realms associated with divine desire and will.

[B] Or: "And from the thirteen tikunim of the precious supernal beard" — The term 'תִּקּוּנֵי' (tikunim) is a technical kabbalistic term referring to the thirteen attributes of divine mercy symbolized by the hairs of the divine 'beard' in Lurianic Kabbalah. Preserving this term maintains the technical precision of the mystical concept.

[1] The 'rivers of pure balsam oil' (naharei d'afarsemona dakhya) are mentioned in the Talmud (Taanit 25a) and Zohar as rewards for the righteous in the World to Come. They represent spiritual delight and divine knowledge.

[2] This appears to refer to the divine 'sealing' of the soul for protection during its journey after death, potentially relating to the kabbalistic practice of 'sealing' through divine names for spiritual protection.

[3] The metaphor of raising one's 'horn' (keren) appears frequently in biblical poetry as an image of strength, honor, and triumph. Here it expresses hope for the deceased's exaltation in the afterlife.

[4] The image of the righteous wearing 'crowns of light' in the afterlife appears in the Talmud (Berakhot 17a), where it describes the righteous as 'sitting with their crowns on their heads, enjoying the radiance of the Divine Presence.'

[i] The 'Supernal Whiteness' refers to a high level of divine emanation associated with divine mercy in Lurianic Kabbalah. This divine light is invoked to illuminate the soul's path after death.

[ii] The 'thirteen aspects of the precious supernal beard' refers to the thirteen attributes of divine mercy (based on Exodus 34:6-7) that are visualized in Lurianic Kabbalah as the 'beard' of the divine countenance (Arich Anpin). These channels of mercy are invoked to ease the soul's journey.

[iii] The 'rivers of pure balsam oil' is a talmudic and zoharic image for the spiritual delight that awaits the righteous in the afterlife. These rivers are said to flow from Eden and provide spiritual sustenance and pleasure to departed souls.

[A] Or: "the mystical joining of the seven divine emanations" — This alternate translation more explicitly conveys the mystical nature of the kabbalistic concept of 'yichud' (unification) and clarifies what sefirot are for readers unfamiliar with the term.

[B] Or: ""רצו״ן" (ratzon/will) represents the highest divine attribute, Keter Elyon (Supreme

[1] The Hebrew text uses the term 'yichud' (unification), which has specific kabbalistic connotations involving the mystical joining of divine attributes. I've translated this as 'focus' for readability while adding the original Hebrew word in parentheses to preserve the technical meaning.

[i] Cf. Psalm 102:1 — This psalm is particularly appropriate for the deathbed prayer as it speaks of affliction, shortness of life, and divine mercy. By beginning with this verse, the prayer establishes itself in the tradition of biblical supplication in times of extreme distress. | Cf. Exodus 3:14 — This divine name is associated with divine mercy and redemption. Its use in this prayer invokes God's essential nature as the source of all existence, particularly appropriate when addressing matters of life and death. | Cf. Numbers 16:22 — This divine title emphasizes God's sovereignty over the human spirit and His intimate knowledge of each person. In the deathbed context, it acknowledges God's authority to receive the spirit back to Himself. | Cf. Zohar — These terms reflect the Zoharic and Lurianic kabbalistic worldview where the soul's journey after death involves passage through various palaces or heavenly chambers (heikhalot), confrontation with negative forces, and ultimate ascent to divine realms. The prayer seeks to provide mystical protection and guidance for this journey. | Cf. Psalm 18:10-13 — This allusion draws on biblical depictions of God riding upon the clouds and manifesting through thunder and lightning. In the context of this prayer, it symbolizes divine intervention to protect the departing soul and chase away harmful spiritual entities. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Berakhot 8a — This prayer hopes for the dying person to experience the most elevated form of death—a 'divine kiss' where the soul is drawn forth by God Himself rather than by the Angel of Death. This represents a painless, spiritually elevated transition. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 5 — This passage aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's broader cosmology of heavenly palaces (heikhalot) through which the soul ascends after death. The prayer invokes these same structures to facilitate the soul's journey.

[ii] The text instructs the reader to meditate on the word 'ken' (thus/so be it) as representing the unification of the seven lower sefirot (divine emanations), which in Kabbalah are Chesed, Gevurah, Tiferet, Netzach, Hod, Yesod, and Malchut.

[iii] The word 'yehi' (may it be) is meant to be contemplated as representing the unification of the sefirot of Chochmah (Wisdom) and Binah (Understanding), the second and third highest divine emanations that together form the intellectual faculties in Kabbalistic thought.

[iv] This describes Ratzon (Will) as representing Keter Elyon (Supreme Crown), the highest sefirah, which channels divine abundance from Ein Sof (the Infinite) through the concealed faculty of Da'at (Knowledge) to the lower emanations.

[v] This refers to reciting Psalm 91 seven times. Rabbinic tradition (Shevuot 15b) calls this psalm 'Shir Shel Pega'im' (Song of Afflictions/Demons) because of its perceived power to protect against harmful spiritual forces.

[vi] Ana Bekoach is a kabbalistic prayer composed of 42 words, corresponding to the 42-letter divine name. It is often recited for spiritual protection.

ושיר למעלות סי׳ קכ״א. עם שאר פסוקי דרחמי ביניהם ברצון המסדר ויכוונו בפסוק כי מלאביו יצוה לך ויאמרוהו ז״פ בכל פעם ופעם בטוב תלין ותקין וכדומה. ויוסיפו סדר של לוי״ה[i] כנודע (שהוא ל״פ לישועתך. ו׳ פעמים ויהי נועם. י׳ פעמים יברכך. ה׳ פעמים המלאך): ואל יזיזו הגוסס ממקומו.[ii] ולא יעשו שום מעשה לקרב מיתתו[iii] ואין מתפללים עליו אז שתשוב נפשו עליו ודברים אחרים השייכים לזה עיין בפרק כ״ו ממאמר א׳. ומנהג הצדיקים לקדש ידיהם

And they should focus on the verse "For He shall command His angels concerning you" and recite it seven times on each occasion with "You shall rest well and awaken"[2] and similar verses. And they should add the order of the "levayah"[3] (escort/accompaniment) as is known (which consists of reciting "For Your salvation" 30 times, "May the pleasantness" 6 times, "May the Lord bless you" 10 times, and "The angel" 5 times). And they should not move the dying Crown), which channels divine abundance from the Infinite Divine Source (Ein Sof) through the hidden faculty of Knowledge (Da'at)" — This alternative offers a more explanatory translation that might be clearer for readers without background in kabbalistic terminology, while still preserving the essential concepts.

[A] Or: "And if the transition is delayed and the person is in distress, God forbid" — This alternative uses more neutral language about the dying process that some might find less confronting while maintaining the essential meaning of the Hebrew phrase.

[1] The Hebrew 'Shir Shel Pega'im' literally means 'Song of Afflictions' or 'Song against Harmful Occurrences.' This is a traditional rabbinic name for Psalm 91, believed to have protective powers against negative spiritual forces.

[2] This phrase refers to the verse in Job 11:18, which is not explicitly quoted in the Hebrew text but is referenced with 'בטוב תלין ותקין'. It was considered an appropriate verse for the dying as it speaks of both resting (associated with death) and awakening (suggesting resurrection).

[3] While 'levayah' typically refers to a funeral procession, in this context it refers to a specific sequence of prayers meant to 'accompany' the soul as it transitions from the body. I've preserved the original term while adding a clarifying translation.

[i] The 'order of levayah (accompaniment)' refers to a specific sequence of prayers meant to accompany the soul as it departs from the body.

[ii] This instruction not to move someone who is actively dying (goses) reflects halakhic rulings based on the concern that any movement might hasten death, which would be forbidden.

[iii] This prohibition against doing anything that might hasten death reflects the Jewish legal principle that while one need not artificially prolong life, one may not actively shorten it either.

סמוך למיתתן[i] שם בפרק כ״ב:[ii]

And they should not do anything to hasten his death, and they should not pray at that point that his soul return to him, and other matters related to this can be found in Chapter 26 of the First Discourse.[2] And it was the custom of the righteous to sanctify their hands near the time of their death, as described in Chapter 22. 3345R

בָּרוּךְ שְׁמוֹ חַי וְקַיָּם לְעוֹלָם וָעֶד:[iv][v] 3145

Blessed is His name, who lives and endures forever and ever.[3] 3350R

[1]The term 'goses' has specific halakhic significance, referring to someone in the final stages of dying (traditionally defined as within 72 hours of death). I've preserved this technical term with a clarifying translation.

[2]These cross-references to other sections of Ma'avar Yabok demonstrate the interconnected nature of the text, with practical instructions in this section supported by theological explanations elsewhere in the work.

[3]This liturgical declaration affirms God's eternal nature and serves a dual purpose in Ma'avar Yabok: it models proper spiritual conduct at the moment of death (attributed to Moses) while also establishing theological continuity between mortality and eternity. By declaring God's eternal existence, the dying person acknowledges that while their physical life ends, the divine reality transcends death.

[i]This describes a custom of the righteous to ritually wash their hands as death approaches, symbolizing spiritual purification before the soul's departure.

[ii]Cf. Zohar — This passage draws on Zoharic teachings about how to properly focus one's intention (kavvanah) during the recitation of prayers for the dying. The specific meditation on the words "ken," "yehi," and "ratzon" reflects the kabbalistic practice of connecting specific Hebrew words to particular divine emanations (sefirot). | Cf. Psalm 91 — Psalm 91 is referred to as "Shir Shel Pega'im" (Song of Afflictions) based on Talmudic tradition (Shevuot 15b) where it was recited for protection against harmful spiritual forces. Its recitation seven times reflects the belief in its protective power for the vulnerable soul during the transition of death. | Cf. Psalm 121 — This Song of Ascents focuses on divine protection and is considered particularly appropriate for those in vulnerable transitions, including the passage from life to death. | Cf. Talmud — The instruction not to move the dying person (goses) and not to do anything to hasten death aligns with Talmudic teachings that state: "One who closes the eyes of a dying person while the soul is departing is a shedder of blood." This passage in Ma'avar Yabok extends this principle to include any action that might hasten death.

[iii]Cf. Deuteronomy 34 — This passage references a rabbinic tradition about Moses' final moments that elaborates on the biblical account, showing how even the greatest prophet accepted divine judgment with spiritual composure. | Cf. Bava Batra 17a — This passage connects to the rabbinic tradition that Moses died through a divine kiss, a peaceful departure reflecting his spiritual perfection, serving as a model for the ideal death.

[iv]This liturgical phrase appears in the text as part of the deathbed ritual, specifically attributed to Moses who is said to have recited it when informed of his imminent death. The phrase thus serves as a model of ideal spiritual conduct at the moment of death—affirming divine sovereignty even as one faces mortality.

[v]Cf. Traditional Jewish liturgy — This phrase appears in various Jewish prayers and liturgical contexts, often as a response to hearing God's name pronounced in blessing formulas. It represents a standard traditional affirmation of God's eternal nature and sovereignty. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — In this context, the phrase appears as part of deathbed rituals described in Ma'avar Yabok, specifically attributed to Moses at the time of his death. This suggests it as an appropriate final declaration of faith for the dying person. | Cf. Daniel 4:31 — The phrase echoes biblical declarations of God's eternal sovereignty, particularly reminiscent of Daniel 4:31 where God's dominion is described as 'an everlasting dominion' that 'endures from generation to generation.'

[1]The author is indicating that Moses's practice of reciting 'Blessed be His name, living and enduring forever' before death should be universally adopted. This reflects the text's purpose as a practical guide for proper conduct at the moment of death.

[2]This instruction reflects the Jewish practice of ensuring a minyan (quorum of ten) at death, creating a sacred space that facilitates the soul's transition. The presence of community at this critical moment serves both practical and mystical purposes.

[3]This refers to the kabbalistic practice of yichud (unification), where participants direct their thoughts toward unifying divine attributes, creating spiritual channels to assist the departing soul.

[4]The text assumes active participation of the dying person in these final rituals when possible, encouraging a conscious spiritual transition rather than passive reception of last rites.

[5]The Hebrew וְיִדְגּוּ לָרֹב contains a play on words, as the verb comes from the root דג meaning 'fish.' The blessing invokes both numerical increase and spiritual protection, as fish were considered symbolically protected from the evil eye by living beneath the water's surface.

[i]The phrase refers to learning from Moses's example, mentioned in the previous line where Moses recites 'Blessed be His name, living and enduring forever' at his moment of death. This serves as a didactic interjection by the author, encouraging readers to emulate this pious practice.

[ii]Cf. Psalms 3:9 — The phrase serves as a transitional instruction, directing readers to learn from Moses' example of reciting 'Blessed be His name, living and enduring forever' before death.

[iii]The number ten (asarah) refers to a minyan, the quorum required for communal prayer in Judaism. In kabbalistic thought, a minyan creates a complete spiritual structure mirroring the ten divine sefirot (emanations), establishing a channel for divine presence.

[iv]The phrase 'focus on the unification of holiness' (yichud ha-kedushah) has kabbalistic significance, referring to the mystical unification of divine attributes that facilitates the soul's transition to higher realms.

[v]The term 'yetziat neshamah' (departure of the soul) is a euphemism for death that emphasizes the transition of the soul rather than the cessation of bodily functions, reflecting the text's spiritual approach to death.

[vi]Cf. Chapter 3, Discourse 3 of Ma'avar Yabok — The author refers the reader to an earlier section for deeper explanation of why ten people should be present at death. In Jewish tradition, a minyan (quorum of ten) creates a space where the Divine Presence (Shekhinah) dwells, which would facilitate the soul's transition. | Cf. Genesis 32:1-2 (Mahanaim) — The presence of ten people at death creates a sacred space similar to Jacob's 'Mahanaim'—where the human realm (represented by ten Jews) meets the angelic realm, creating a protected pathway for the soul's ascent.

[vii]This opening verse from Genesis 48:16 comes from Jacob's blessing to his grandsons Ephraim and Manasseh. The phrase 'may they multiply abundantly like fish' (וְיִדְגּוּ לָרֹב) carries special significance as fish were believed to be immune to the evil eye because they live beneath the water's surface, symbolizing protection from spiritual harm—a particularly appropriate blessing for someone approaching death.

[1]This phrase comes from the second blessing of the daily Amidah prayer, which focuses on God's power to resurrect the dead. Its inclusion in deathbed prayers reinforces the belief that death is not final but a transition overseen by God, providing comfort to both the dying and those present.

[2]The Hebrew יְחִידָתִי (literally 'my only one') is traditionally understood as referring to the soul, while 'the dog' is sometimes interpreted in kabbalistic tradition as a reference to the Angel of Death. The verse thus requests protection for the departing soul during its transition.

[3]The Aramaic phrase לְפֻרְקָנָךְ סַבְּרִית repeats the preceding Hebrew sentiment. This doubling in two languages is common in Jewish liturgy, particularly for important concepts, ensuring both understanding and emphasis.

[4]This verse from Psalm 31:6 holds special significance in Jewish deathbed traditions. Rabbi Akiva is said to have recited it during his martyrdom, and it later influenced Jesus's final words according to Luke 23:46. In Ma'avar Yabok, it represents the ultimate surrender of the soul to divine care.

[i]The term 'my only one' (יְחִידָתִי) is a traditional reference to the soul, which is considered unique and irreplaceable. In the context of deathbed prayers, this verse specifically requests protection for the departing soul from the Angel of Death, metaphorically referred to as 'the dog' in kabbalistic literature.

[ii]This verse from 2 Samuel 24:14 reflects the Jewish theological preference to be judged by God rather than by humans, as divine judgment is tempered by mercy. In the context of approaching death, it expresses surrender to divine judgment while maintaining hope in God's compassion.

[iii]This is an Aramaic translation of the preceding Hebrew phrase ('For Your salvation I hope, O LORD'). The inclusion of both Hebrew and Aramaic versions reflects the practice of providing translations accessible to all, while also alluding to kabbalistic beliefs that prayers in Aramaic are especially effective because the angels who might intercept prayers do not understand Aramaic, allowing these prayers to ascend directly to God.

[iv]This verse from Psalm 31:6 is traditionally recited at the moment of death, following the example of Rabbi Akiva who recited it during his martyrdom. It represents the ultimate act of spiritual surrender, entrusting one's soul to divine care. The phrase 'God of truth' (אֵל אֱמֶת) is particularly significant as its initials spell אמת (truth), a word associated with divine seals and protection.

[v]The phrase 'when I awake' (בְּהָקִיץ) in this context refers to the soul's awakening after death in the World to Come. The verse thus provides comfort by suggesting that the departing soul will experience divine presence and satisfaction after the transition of death.

[1] This statement combines God's self-identification from Exodus 3:14 with a temporal expansion affirming divine existence across all time. The translation 'Unique One' for מְיֻחָד emphasizes God's absolute singularity, which is the theological focus at this climactic moment in the prayer sequence.

[i] This repetition echoes the declaration from 1 Kings 18:39 during Elijah's confrontation with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel, when the people acknowledged the true God. The doubled phrase emphasizes absolute certainty in God's singularity at the critical moment of death, when such clarity is spiritually crucial.

[ii] This statement combines God's self-identification to Moses (Exodus 3:14) with a temporal expansion affirming divine existence across all time (past, present, and future). This formulation has kabbalistic significance, corresponding to the sefirot of Keter (Crown), Chochmah (Wisdom), and Binah (Understanding), and represents the dying person's contemplation of God's transcendent nature beyond the limitations of mortal existence.

[iii] This final verse frames death as peaceful rest rather than fearful annihilation, echoing Job 3:13 but transforming its context from Job's lament to a positive acceptance of death as divinely ordained rest. The transition from active to passive voice ('I have laid down' to 'I shall rest') mirrors the soul's surrender to divine will.

[iv] Cf. Genesis 48:16 — This opening verse is from Jacob's blessing to his grandsons, making it particularly appropriate in the context of deathbed prayers, as it connects the dying person to the patriarchal lineage and invokes divine protection. | Cf. Exodus 15:11 — This verse from the Song of the Sea celebrates God's power to save from seemingly impossible circumstances, symbolically connecting the journey through death to Israel's passage through the sea—both representing divine deliverance through overwhelming obstacles. | Cf. Amidah prayer — This liturgical quotation emphasizes the belief in resurrection and God's power over life and death, providing comfort to the dying person by affirming that death is not final but a transition overseen by God. | Cf. Psalm 22:21 — This verse uses the term 'my only one' (יְחִידָתִי) which traditionally refers to the soul, thus specifically requesting protection for the departing soul from spiritual dangers. | Cf. Exodus 15:16 — This verse continues the motif of the exodus as a metaphor for the soul's transition, invoking divine protection during the journey and celebrating God as the redeemer who guides the soul across the threshold between worlds. | Cf. 2 Samuel 24:14 — This verse expresses the preference to fall into God's hands rather than human hands, reflecting the theological view that the soul's judgment should be entrusted to divine mercy rather than earthly considerations. | Cf. Genesis 49:18 — This verse from Jacob's deathbed declaration is particularly significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, as it represents an appropriate sentiment for someone approaching death—expressing hope in divine salvation. | Cf. Psalm 31:6 — This verse is traditionally recited at the moment of death, following the example of Rabbi Akiva who recited it during his martyrdom. It represents the ultimate act of spiritual surrender, entrusting one's soul to divine care. | Cf. Psalm

והעומדים עליו אומרים בקול רם[i] לך וכו׳[ii iii]

And those standing beside him[A] say aloud,[B] "Go forth..." etc.[C]

[A]Or: "And those attending to him" — The phrase could be referring specifically to those attending to the dying person in their final moments, rather than just anyone standing nearby.

[B]Or: "in a loud voice" — A more literal translation that emphasizes the importance of the words being clearly audible to the dying person.

[C]Or: "Go forth (and the rest of the formula)" — The abbreviation 'וכו" (etc.) indicates that the full prayer beginning with 'לך' (Go forth) is to be recited, which appears in full elsewhere in the text.

[1]These four repetitions of 'Act for the sake of' (עֲשֵׂה לְמַעַן) create a rhythmic, incantatory quality in the original Hebrew, building intensity as the prayer reaches its conclusion. They invoke four fundamental aspects of divinity—God's name, power, teaching, and holiness—as the basis for divine mercy toward the departing soul.

[2]The final verse presents death through the gentler metaphor of sleep, transforming what could be a fearful transition into a peaceful conclusion. The progressive stages—laying down, quieting, sleeping, and finally resting—mirror the process of dying while framing it as natural and tranquil.

18:17-18 — These verses depict divine rescue in the imagery of being drawn from overwhelming waters—a metaphor for the soul being rescued from the depths of suffering or death. | Cf. Psalm 116:9 — This verse expresses the hope to walk before God in 'the lands of the living,' which in the context of Ma'avar Yabok can be understood as referring both to this world for healing or the World to Come for the dying. | Cf. Psalm 5:8 — This verse depicts the soul's journey to the divine sanctuary after death, expressing the hope that the deceased will be received into God's presence with lovingkindness. | Cf. Psalm 17:15 — This verse contains the powerful image of awakening to behold the divine countenance, which in the context of death refers to the soul's awakening in the World to Come and experiencing divine presence. | Cf. Psalm 150:6 — This concluding verse of the Book of Psalms serves as a reminder that the ultimate purpose of the soul is to praise God, suggesting that the departing soul will continue this purpose in the spiritual realm. | Cf. Psalm 79:9 — This verse shifts from individual to communal perspective, recognizing that prayers for the dying individual are connected to the broader community's relationship with God. | Cf. Psalm 78:38 — This verse emphasizes divine mercy in the face of human sin, providing reassurance that God's compassion extends even to the final moments of life and beyond. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:4 — The Shema is traditionally recited as one's final words, following the example of Rabbi Akiva. In Ma'avar Yabok, this affirmation of divine unity represents the ultimate spiritual focus at the moment of death. | Cf. Exodus 3:14 — The reference to 'I AM THAT I AM' (אֶהְיֶה אֲשֶׁר אֶהְיֶה) connects the dying person to God's eternal nature, transcending time and encompassing all existence. | Cf. 1 Samuel 2:6 — This reference to God's sovereignty over both death and life provides theological context for understanding death as part of divine providence rather than random misfortune. | Cf. Isaiah 43:10-11 — This reference emphasizes God's exclusive divinity, reminding the dying person that they are returning to the one true God who has no equals or competitors. | Cf. Job 3:13 — The final verse presents death as restful sleep, offering a peaceful perspective on the transition that contrasts with fears of suffering or judgment.

[i]This instruction emphasizes that the prayer should be recited loudly enough for the dying person to hear, as it is believed to help guide the soul in its departure from the body.

[ii]The abbreviation 'וכו" (etc.) refers to the complete prayer beginning with 'Go forth' (לך), which appears in full elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok. This prayer is recited when death is imminent to facilitate the soul's peaceful transition.

[iii]Cf. Genesis 32 (Jacob's crossing of the Jabbok) — The instruction to say 'Go forth' alludes to the soul's journey across the metaphorical Jabbok River (from life to death), mirroring Jacob's transformative crossing in Genesis. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, discourse 2, section 6, verse 184 — The abbreviation 'וכו" indicates that the complete prayer beginning with 'לך' should be recited, which was detailed earlier in the text. This prayer is specifically designed to facilitate the soul's peaceful departure from the body.

"Go, for the LORD has sent you."[1] "Go, and may the LORD be with you. The LORD his God is with him, and he shall ascend." "May the LORD bless you and protect you. May the LORD shine His face upon you and be gracious to you. May the LORD lift His face to you and grant you peace." "On his right is Michael, on his left is Gabriel, before him is Raphael, behind him is Uriel, and above his head is the Divine Presence."[2] "Be strong and courageous, do not be terrified or dismayed, for the LORD your God is with you wherever you go." "And He said, 'My Presence will go with you, and I will give you rest.'" "Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise Your name; the righteous will crown themselves through me when You deal bountifully with me." "Why are you downcast, O my soul, and why are you disquieted within me? Hope in God, for I shall yet praise Him, the salvation of my countenance and my God." "He shall slaughter it at the side of the altar northward before the LORD; and Aaron's sons, the priests, shall dash its blood against the altar all around." "For on this day atonement shall be made for you to cleanse you; from all your sins you shall be clean before the LORD."[3] "But its entrails and its legs he shall wash with water. And the priest shall offer up the whole on the altar, as a burnt offering, an offering by fire, of a sweet savor to the LORD." "The LORD is gracious and compassionate, slow to anger and abundant in kindness." "The LORD will be a stronghold for the oppressed, a stronghold in times of trouble." "The right hand of the LORD is exalted; the right hand of the LORD does valiantly."

[1] This opening verse establishes divine permission for the soul to depart from the body. In Ma'avar Yabok, these words are to be recited aloud when death appears imminent, functioning as a spiritual release mechanism.

[2] This protective formula appears in numerous Jewish magical and mystical texts. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it creates a sacred space around the dying person, protecting the departing soul from negative spiritual forces while facilitating its journey upward.

[3] This verse from the Yom Kippur service takes on new meaning in the deathbed context, suggesting that death itself serves as a final atonement that purifies the soul before it enters the divine presence.

[i] This opening phrase 'Go, for the LORD has sent you' begins a specific sequence of verses recited when death is imminent. The word 'lekh' (go forth) is considered particularly powerful in facilitating the soul's departure.

[ii] This formula describing angelic protection surrounding the dying person is a key element in kabbalistic death rituals. The four archangels are positioned at the cardinal directions, creating a protective shield, while the Divine Presence (Shekhinah) hovers above.

[iii] This and several subsequent verses referring to Temple sacrifices are recontextualized in this deathbed ritual. In kabbalistic thought, the dying person's suffering serves as a form of atonement similar to sacrificial offerings, purifying the soul before its transition.

[i]This verse from Isaiah's vision of the divine throne room (Isaiah 6:2) is included to prepare the soul for its encounter with the divine presence after death. The seraphim, with their six wings, symbolize the highest order of angels that the soul might encounter.

[ii]This verse from Isaiah 58:11 is particularly significant in the context of death as it promises divine guidance, spiritual satisfaction even in parched places (צחצחות/tzachtzachot), and strengthening of the bones—which in kabbalistic thought connects to the eventual resurrection.

Lord (ADNY), in holiness, sees all that is high.[AB] 3500R

[A]Or: "The Lord (ADNY) among them in holiness, sees all that is exalted." — The phrase "ב״ם" could be interpreted as "among them" rather than being part of an acronym. This alternative captures the potential meaning that the Divine Presence is among the holy ones while observing all that is exalted.

[B]Or: "The Lord through them shall behold in holiness all that is elevated." — This interpretation suggests that "ב״ם" means "through them" and rearranges the syntax to indicate that God works through intermediaries to perceive that which is holy and exalted. This reading would fit with kabbalistic notions of divine perception through various emanations.

death, as it connects to the kabbalistic concept of the 'luz bone'—the indestructible part of the body from which resurrection will occur.

[1]This instruction indicates that the preceding verse should be recited both normally and then in reverse order, a practice found in Jewish mystical traditions to unlock deeper spiritual power from the text.

[i]Cf. Priestly Blessing — The Priestly Blessing appears prominently as part of this deathbed ritual, showing how this ancient blessing was repurposed within Ma'avar Yabok to provide spiritual protection and divine favor at the moment of death. | Cf. Isaiah's Vision of the Seraphim — The description of the seraphim from Isaiah's throne vision appears in this deathbed ritual, suggesting that the dying person's soul is being prepared for an encounter with the divine presence similar to Isaiah's prophetic experience. | Cf. Song of Songs — Verses from the Song of Songs are included to frame death as a loving divine summons rather than a fearful separation, using bridal mysticism to depict the soul's union with God. | Cf. Psalm 32:7 — This verse about God being a 'hiding place' provides comfort by suggesting divine protection even in the transition of death. | Cf. Thirteen Attributes of Mercy — The inclusion of God's Thirteen Attributes of Mercy suggests the ritual is invoking divine compassion to ease the soul's judgment after death.

[ii]This line appears to be a kabbalistic formula that introduces the next section of prayers. It refers to the divine name Adonai (אדנ״י) being present 'in holiness' and perceiving all that is elevated. In kabbalistic practice, such formulas often signal transitions between different spiritual levels or categories of prayer.

[iii]Cf. Psalm 68:18 — This phrase appears to allude to Psalm 68:18 which mentions God being 'among them' (בם) in holiness. The connection reinforces the idea of divine presence amidst holiness. | Cf. Isaiah 6:1-3 — The phrase echoes Isaiah's vision where God is depicted as high and lifted up, with angelic beings declaring holiness. This connection suggests that this line in Ma'avar

[A] Or: "It is necessary to divide each of these divine names into three parts" — This alternate translation makes more explicit that the text is referring to divine names and emphasizes the obligatory nature of the instruction with 'it is necessary' rather than the more neutral 'should'.

[B] Or: "and for the mystical explanation of this practice, consult Chapter 25 of the Fifth Discourse" — This alternate translation suggests that the 'reason' being referenced is specifically a mystical or kabbalistic explanation, which is likely given the context of divine names in Ma'avar Yabok, and provides a more formal rendering of the textual reference.

[C] Or: "Ehyeh [Divine Name]—in Eden, the garden of Your unification, receive his righteousness." — This alternate translation preserves the divine name 'Ehyeh' untranslated, which is important in kabbalistic contexts, and renders 'yichudekha' more precisely as 'unification' rather than 'unity' to better capture its mystical significance.

[1] The imagery of divine banners (degalekha) appears in Song of Songs and symbolizes divine protection and guidance for the ascending soul.

[2] The Hebrew 'ziv kedushato' (radiance of his holiness) refers to the spiritual illumination that surrounds the soul as it ascends to higher realms in kabbalistic thought.

Yabok is meant to evoke the imagery of divine transcendence that is nevertheless perceptible in sacred contexts. | Cf. Zohar, Terumah 145b — The Zohar in Terumah discusses how divine names operate in the context of holiness, particularly how the name ADNY (אדני) functions in relation to perceiving divine glory. This kabbalistic understanding likely informs how this phrase in Ma'avar Yabok should be understood as referring to divine perception through specific names and attributes.

[i] This instruction to divide divine names into three arrangements is a kabbalistic practice related to proper meditation on divine names during deathbed rituals. The tripartite division likely corresponds to the three levels of the soul (nefesh, ruach, and neshamah) or the three worlds through which the soul must travel after death.

[ii] This cross-reference to Chapter 25 of Discourse 5 follows the typical pattern in Ma'avar Yabok where practical instructions are given and then the reader is directed elsewhere in the book for the deeper mystical explanations behind the practices.

[iii] Cf. 42-letter Divine Name (Shem Mem-Bet) — This instruction likely relates to the proper division and meditation upon the 42-letter Divine Name, which appears elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok as a central mystical tool for deathbed rituals. The text is directing practitioners to divide each divine name into three parts for proper kabbalistic intention (kavvanah).

[iv] This line begins with the divine name 'Ehyeh' (I AM), which God revealed to Moses at the burning bush. In kabbalistic tradition, this is one of the sacred names associated with the transition of the soul. The text arranges these verses to correspond with this divine name.

[v] The Hebrew term 'nefesh aliyato' refers to the ascension of the person's vital soul (nefesh). In kabbalah, the soul has multiple components, with nefesh being the lowest level that remains connected to the body even after death.

[vi] This seven-line prayer follows the pattern of the 42-letter divine name, encoded in the first letters of each phrase. This mystical name is considered particularly powerful for elevating the soul during its transition.

[vii] Cf. Garden of Eden — The text employs the Garden of Eden (Gan Eden) as a metaphor dwelling One, command goodness and the salvation of his praise.[1]

And He rode upon a cherub, and flew;[2] He soared upon the wings of the wind. Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth, for your love is better than wine. God, the Lord God has spoken and called the earth from the rising of the sun to its setting. From Zion, the perfection of beauty, God has shined forth. Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one.[3] The LORD, He is God. The LORD is God. The LORD reigns, the LORD has reigned, the LORD shall reign forever and ever.[4]

[1]This prayer is specifically designed to be recited during the YaBOK ritual (crossing of the Yabok), where the 112 verses correspond to the numerical value of YaBOK and are divided into groups corresponding to three divine names.

[2]The verb וַיֵּדָא (from the root דאה) in the original Hebrew suggests a soaring or gliding motion, conveying God's effortless and majestic movement through the heavens.

[3]This is the Shema prayer, the central affirmation of Jewish monotheism, traditionally recited twice daily and at the moment of death. The divine name appears as יְיָ in the manuscript, a common substitution for the Tetragrammaton to avoid writing the holy name directly.

[4]This liturgical formula expresses God's sovereignty across all time: present (מֶלֶךְ), past (מָלָךְ), and for the soul's ultimate divine resting place after death. This alludes to various kabbalistic texts that describe Gan Eden as a spiritual realm of divine unity rather than merely a physical paradise. | Cf. Ehyeh asher Ehyeh (I am that I am) — The opening word 'Ehyeh' alludes to God's self-identification to Moses at the burning bush. In Ma'avar Yabok, this divine name appears frequently in death rituals and is organized into 21 verses (the first of three groups in the 112 YaBOK verses). | Cf. Divine banners — The reference to divine banners (d'galeikha) likely alludes to Song of Songs 2:4 'His banner over me is love,' which in kabbalistic interpretation refers to divine protection over the soul.

[i]This verse from Psalms 18:11 describes God's majestic movement through the heavens. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this imagery of divine flight serves to comfort the dying by visualizing God's approach to receive the departing soul.

[ii]This verse from Song of Songs 1:2 is reinterpreted in kabbalistic tradition as referring to 'death by divine kiss' (מיתת נשיקה), considered the highest form of death reserved for the righteous. The inclusion of this verse in the deathbed sequence shows how Ma'avar Yabok transforms potentially frightening moments into sacred, intimate encounters with the divine.

[iii]The Shema prayer is Judaism's central affirmation of monotheistic faith. Ma'avar Yabok specifically recommends reciting this at the moment of death, following the example of Rabbi Akiva who recited it during his martyrdom. It represents the soul's final declaration of faith before departing from the body.

[iv]This tripartite declaration affirms God's sovereignty across all time: present (מֶלֶךְ/reigns), past (מָלָךְ/has reigned), and future (יִמְלֹךְ/shall reign). As the final statement in this sequence of verses for the dying, it provides reassurance that beyond the transition of death, God's eternal kingship remains constant.

[v]Cf. Psalms 18:11 — This verse from Psalms depicts God's majestic movement through the heavens, often used in deathbed contexts to visualize the divine presence coming to receive the soul. | Cf. Song of Songs 1:2 — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is reinterpreted from its original romantic meaning to symbolize the 'divine kiss' (neshikah)—the mystical concept of death as an intimate union between God and the righteous soul. This is particularly significant as the soul departs the body. | Cf. Psalms 50:1-2 — These verses emphasize divine sovereignty and universal rule, appropriate when contemplating death as submission to divine judgment. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:4 — The Shema is Judaism's central declaration of faith. In Ma'avar Yabok, it's recommended for recitation at the moment of death, following the example of Rabbi Akiva who recited it during his martyrdom. It represents the soul's final affirmation of divine unity before departing. | Cf. 1 Kings 18:39 — This declaration from the contest between Elijah and the prophets future (יִמְלֹךְ). It combines elements from several biblical verses into a traditional Jewish prayer formula that appears in many liturgical contexts.

(תהלים ג) מִזְמוֹר לְדָוִד בְּבָרְחוֹ מִפְּנֵי אַבְשָׁלוֹם בְּנוֹ[viii]: יְיָ מָה־רַבּוּ — (Psalm 3) A psalm of David, when he fled from his son Absalom. O LORD, how numerous are my ad-

[1]The Hebrew term 'psuqei ha-yichud' refers specifically to biblical verses that are recited to achieve mystical unification (yichud) between different divine attributes or between the human and divine realms. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these verses were particularly important for the soul's transition at death.

[2]Ma'avar Yabok is organized into several major discourses (ma'amarim), each dealing with different aspects of death rituals and the soul's journey. This reference suggests that detailed explanations about the theological significance and proper recitation of these unification verses are found in a specific section of the work.

[3]The original text uses an impersonal construction with the third person ('if he wishes'), which I've rendered as 'if one wishes' to maintain the formal tone of liturgical instructions while using more gender-inclusive language.

[4]This is a direct translation of the opening line of Psalm 3. In the original text, only these first few words are mentioned as a way to identify the psalm, but I've included the English translation of these words rather than transliterating the Hebrew.

[5]This is a literal translation of 'עד סופו', which simply indicates that the entire psalm should be recited, not just the opening verse mentioned in the instruction.

of Baal serves as a powerful affirmation of faith at the moment of death, acknowledging divine sovereignty. | Cf. Exodus 15:18 — This tripartite formula of divine kingship across time (past, present, and future) serves as a final affirmation of God's eternal sovereignty as the soul prepares to transition beyond temporal existence.

[i]This phrase refers to specific biblical verses that are understood in the Jewish mystical tradition to facilitate spiritual unification (yichud)—the bringing together of different aspects of divinity or the connection between the human and divine realms. Such verses were considered particularly powerful at the time of death.

[ii]The text refers readers to Chapter 8 of the Fifth Discourse for more information on these unification verses. This cross-referencing is common in Ma'avar Yabok, showing how the work is structured with detailed explanations in specific sections.

[iii]Cf. psuqei ha-yichud (verses of unification) — These verses are mentioned throughout the text as having special power during the transition from life to death. They were believed to help the soul unite with divine realms and protect it during its journey after death. | Cf. Chapter 8 of the Fifth Discourse — This self-reference within Ma'avar Yabok indicates that a systematic explanation of the theological significance and practical application of these unification verses is provided elsewhere in the text.

[iv]This is a liturgical instruction within Ma'avar Yabok that gives the reader the option to recite Psalm 3. The phrase literally means 'and if he wishes, he should recite.'

[v]This is the opening line of Psalm 3, which begins 'O LORD, how many are my foes.' The phrase identifies which psalm should be recited by its opening words, a common practice in Jewish liturgical instructions.

[vi]This phrase means 'until its end,' instructing that the entire psalm should be recited, not just the opening verse.

[vii]Cf. Psalm 3 — The text references Psalm 3 by its opening words 'LORD, how many are my foes' (מה רבו צרי ה׳). This psalm is traditionally associated with King David's flight from his son Absalom and contains themes of divine protection amidst persecution, making it appropriate for the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which deals with prayers for the sick and dying who may feel surrounded by afflictions.

[viii]This psalm's historical context of David fleeing from his son Absalom would resonate deeply with the sick or dying person, as it addresses a situation of extreme vulnerability and betrayal, yet demonstrates how one can maintain faith even in such circumstances.

[1]The Hebrew term 'Selah' (סֶלָה) appears three times in this psalm. Its exact meaning is uncertain, but it is generally understood as a musical direction indicating a pause, emphasis, or elevation. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these pauses would create moments for contemplation during the recitation, particularly important when the psalm is used at a deathbed.

[2]This verse forms the theological center of the psalm in Ma'avar Yabok's context. The simple act of sleeping and waking becomes a powerful statement of faith in divine protection through the transition of death. The Hebrew verb 'יִסְמְכֵנִי' (sustains me) has connotations of both physical support and spiritual strength.

[3]The original text abbreviates this as 'וגו׳ עד סופו סי׳ קי״ו' (etc. until its end, sign 116), using the common rabbinic convention of referring to psalms by their number rather than by their opening words.

[4]The text refers to prayers and verses that were already detailed earlier in Ma'avar Yabok, demonstrating how the book functions as a practical manual with cross-references to its own sections.

[i]This verse is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of deathbed prayers, as the imagery of lying down, sleeping, and awakening becomes a powerful metaphor for death and resurrection. The Hebrew verb 'יִסְמְכֵנִי' (supports/sustains me) suggests divine support during both sleep and the ultimate sleep of death.

[ii]Cf. Book of Psalms — This psalm appears in Ma'avar Yabok as one of several psalms recommended for recitation by or for the sick and dying. Psalm 3 is particularly appropriate in this context because it speaks of lying down, sleeping, and awakening (verse 6), which serves as a metaphor for death and resurrection. The psalm's themes of divine protection amid overwhelming adversaries would resonate with someone facing severe illness or approaching death. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Berakhot 4b — The Talmud connects Psalm 3 specifically to nighttime protection and uses the phrase 'I lay down and slept; I awoke, for the LORD sustains me' as a basis for reciting this psalm before sleep. In Ma'avar Yabok, this connection to sleep would be reinterpreted in the context of death, with sleep serving as a metaphor for death and awakening as resurrection or afterlife. | Cf. Psalm 30:4 — Psalm 30:4 ('O LORD, You brought my soul up from the grave; You have kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit') echoes similar themes to Psalm 3's 'I lay down and slept; I awoke, for the LORD sustains me.' Both verses use the metaphor of lying down/death and rising/life to express divine salvation, which explains why both psalms appear in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequences for the sick and dying.

[iii]This is an abbreviation for 'siman 116,' indicating Psalm 116.

[iv]These are the opening words of three biblical verses that were traditionally recited for protection. They come from Exodus 14:19-21 and were believed to have special protective properties.

[v]This refers to the 'Ana Bekoach' prayer, a kabbalistic prayer containing the 42-letter divine name, which was believed to have special protective power for the soul.

order of "Ana Bekoach," "Seraphim standing above Him," etc., as written above. One may also add the poem "Dwellers in houses of clay"[1] to inspire those present to repentance, and in this way there will be merit for the departing soul[2] if they are moved to return from their ways.[3]

Dwellers in houses of clay, why do you lift up your eyes?[4] And what advantage does man have over beast? None! We must know that we are but worms, our backs formed of mere clay—how then can our hearts be proud? What profit is there for man when his end is the grave? This shall be his portion even if he lives a thousand years.[5] Indeed, if he walks in rebellion, he will be swallowed up in the wrath of chance, and burned in flames where gold will avail him nothing.

[1] This is a contemplative poem on mortality that begins 'שוכני בתי חומר' (Dwellers in houses of clay), alluding to Job 4:19. It serves to remind those present of their own mortality and the need for repentance.

[2] The Hebrew term 'מתפטר' (mitpater) literally means 'one who departs' and is a euphemism for the dying person. This reflects the Jewish tendency to use indirect language when referring to death.

[3] The phrase 'לשוב מדרכם' (to return from their ways) is the Hebrew idiom for repentance, literally describing a turning back from one's path, emphasizing repentance as a change of direction in life.

[4] The poem begins with a rhetorical question that confronts human pride by reminding readers of their fragile, mortal nature. 'Houses of clay' refers to human bodies as temporary, fragile vessels.

[5] This reflects the Jewish ethical tradition that contemplates the equalizing nature of death, regardless of lifespan. The poem confronts the reader with the ultimate futility of worldly pursuits given mortality's certainty.

[i] This refers to a poem beginning 'Dwellers in houses of clay' (a reference to Job 4:19), which is a meditation on human mortality and the transience of life.

[ii] This reflects the belief that attending to someone's death could inspire repentance in the witnesses, creating a spiritual benefit for both the living and the deceased.

[iii] The text suggests that the repentance of those attending creates merit (zechut) for the departing soul, reflecting the Jewish belief in the spiritual interconnection between the living and the dead.

[iv] Cf. Psalm 116 — This psalm is recommended for recitation at the deathbed because it deals with deliverance from death and expressions of thanksgiving for divine salvation, making it particularly appropriate in the context of a soul's transition. | Cf. Ana Bekoach prayer — This mystical prayer containing the 42-letter divine name is included in the deathbed ritual because it is believed to have special protective powers for the soul's transition and journey after death. | Cf. Seraphim standing above Him — This verse from Isaiah's vision of the divine throne is included to invoke angelic protection and to create a spiritual environment that facilitates the soul's ascent through the celestial realms. | Cf. Dwellers in houses of clay — This poem, which begins 'Dwellers in houses of clay, why do you lift your eyes?', is a meditation on human mortality and the transience of life, designed to inspire repentance when facing death. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok deathbed ritual — This passage provides instructions for part of the comprehensive deathbed ritual detailed throughout Ma'avar Yabok, connecting this specific sequence of prayers to the larger framework of spiritual care for the dying.

[v] This opening evokes Ecclesiastes' skeptical questioning of human exceptionalism (Ecclesiastes 3:19) to establish the poem's meditation on mortality.

[1] This powerful image of death's stripping away of possessions reflects a theme common in both biblical wisdom literature and rabbinic teachings: that material wealth remains in this world when we depart.

[2] This represents the pivotal turn in the poem, where contemplation of mortality leads to a call for repentance. The conditional 'perhaps' (אוּלַי/ulai) reflects the Jewish concept that while repentance is always possible, divine forgiveness remains God's sovereign choice.

[i] This refers to the kikayon (castor plant) from the Book of Jonah that grew up in a night and perished by morning—a powerful biblical symbol for the transience of human life.

[ii] This echoes Ecclesiastes' theme that no material possessions follow us in death—a motif common in medieval Jewish ethical literature.

[iii] The phrase directly echoes Isaiah 55:7, transforming the poem from a meditation on mortality into a call for repentance—precisely the spiritual movement that Ma'avar Yabok seeks to encourage in the ill.

[iv] This phrase recalls Lamentations 3:41, "Let us lift up our heart with our hands to God in the heavens," a classic posture of penitential prayer.

[v] Cf. Job 4:19 — The poem begins by drawing on Job's metaphor of human frailty, setting up its meditation on mortality and the vanity of worldly pursuits. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 3:19-20 — The poem adopts Ecclesiastes' skeptical stance about human exceptionalism to emphasize the universality of mortality and the futility of worldly pride. | Cf. Psalm 22:7 — The poem uses this self-deprecating imagery to establish the proper humility humans should have before God, given their frail nature. | Cf. Jonah 4:6-10 — Like in the Jonah narrative, this image represents the transience of human life and comfort—here emphasizing how quickly life passes. | Cf. Isaiah 55:7 — The poem shifts from meditation on mortality to a call for repentance, drawing on prophetic language to offer hope amid the somber reflection. | Cf. Lamentations 3:40-41 — The poem adopts this penitential posture from Lamentations, suggesting that the proper response to human frailty is self-examination and prayer. | Cf. Isaiah 53:6 — The poem incorporates this well-known metaphor for human sinfulness to explain why humans, despite knowing their mortality, continue to pursue vanity.

[1]The poem concludes with communal confession rather than individual meditation, shifting from 'you' to 'we,' suggesting that facing mortality properly requires joining in communal acknowledgment of sin and collective dependence on divine mercy.

[2]The Hebrew 'לבקשת רחמים לבד' carries a nuance of prayer with pure intention focused exclusively on compassion for the deceased, rather than for one's own benefit or merit.

[3]I've maintained the active, imperative form of the Hebrew 'דלה' (draw up/lift up), which conveys urgency in the prayer's opening appeal.

[4]The Hebrew 'דופקי דלתיך' literally means 'those who knock at your doors,' a common metaphor in Jewish liturgy for prayer and supplication.

[5]The text shifts here from addressing God about the community ('Your people') to addressing God about an individual ('his arrival'). This reflects how Ma'avar Yabok often moves between communal and individual perspectives.

[6]The possessive form 'Your Garden of Eden' (גן עדניך) emphasizes that this paradisiacal realm belongs to God rather than being an independent location.

[7]This refers to the kabbalistic concept of 'or ha-ganuz' (the hidden light), the primordial light of creation that God concealed for the righteous in the World to Come.

[i]This phrase indicates that the prayer which follows is specifically for when the visitor's sole intention is to seek divine mercy for the deceased or dying person, as opposed to other possible intentions such as seeking merit for oneself or asking the deceased to intercede on behalf of the living.

[ii]A standard liturgical instruction indicating that what follows is a specific prayer to be recited from beginning to end.

[iii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 35 of the Fifth Discourse — The text is introducing a specific prayer formula to be used when one's sole intention is to seek divine mercy for a deceased or dying person, rather than for multiple purposes. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Berachot 60a — The emphasis on having a specific intention (seeking mercy alone) reflects the rabbinic concept that prayers should be offered with clear, focused intention.

[iv]Cf. Psalm 30:4 — The text adapts a personal plea from Psalms into a communal request, connecting the individual's transition at death with the biblical concept of divine rescue from the underworld. | Cf. Song of Songs 5:2 — The prayer transforms the romantic imagery of Song of Songs into a spiritual metaphor for the soul seeking divine audience, particularly appropriate in the context of death as union with the divine. | Cf. Isaiah 26:3 — This prayer adapts Isaiah's promise of peace for the faithful into a wish for the deceased's peaceful transition to the afterlife. | Cf.

In Chapter 15 of the Fifth Discourse there is an appropriate intention[2] for one who entrusts his soul to God's hand,[3] similar to the intention of one who slaughters a sacrifice,[4] involving six elements.[5] At the end there is a short confessional formula[6] to familiarize the sick person with. 3610R 3615R

[1]This concluding line employs a traditional liturgical formula that reaffirms divine forgiveness as the ultimate ground of hope for the deceased's positive judgment.
[2]The Hebrew term 'kavvanah na'otah' refers to the proper mystical intention or mental focus that one should have during significant spiritual moments. In Kabbalah, having the correct kavvanah was considered essential for effective ritual actions.
[3]This is a reference to the moment of death, described euphemistically as 'entrusting one's soul' rather than dying. The phrase draws from Psalm 31:6 'Into Your hand I commit my spirit,' which tradition suggests should be one's final words.
[4]The comparison between death and ritual sacrifice is significant in kabbalistic thought, where a righteous person's death is seen as having atoning power similar to Temple sacrifices.
[5]Though not specified here, these likely refer to the traditional requirements for kosher ritual slaughter: the knife must be perfect, the cut must be continuous, it must sever specific vessels, it must be performed with proper pressure, etc. The text suggests that the soul's departure requires similar careful attention to specific spiritual details.
[6]The vidui (confession) is a central element of Jewish deathbed practice. Jewish tradition emphasizes that everyone should confess before death, as this provides spiritual cleansing and prepares the soul for its journey.

Psalm 36:8 — This familiar biblical imagery of divine protection is repurposed in Ma'avar Yabok to represent the soul finding shelter in the divine presence after death, transforming a protection metaphor into an afterlife comfort. | Cf. Genesis 32:1-2 — Just as Jacob was met by angels as he journeyed, this prayer asks for angels to meet the deceased soul on its journey. This reinforces the book's central metaphor of death as a river crossing similar to Jacob's crossing of the Yabok. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 4 — This prayer operationalizes the book's detailed cosmology of the afterlife, showing how liturgical practice connects to theoretical mystical frameworks.
[i]This refers to Chapter 15 of the Fifth Discourse of Ma'avar Yabok. The book is organized into multiple 'ma'amarim' (discourses), and each discourse contains numbered chapters.
[ii]This phrase refers to the proper spiritual intention (kavvanah) one should have when surrendering one's soul to God at the time of death. In kabbalistic thought, proper intention during this moment was considered crucial for the soul's journey after death.
[iii]This compares the proper intention at death to the ritual slaughter of a sacrifice in the Temple, which required attention to six specific elements according to Jewish law. This creates a parallel between the death of a righteous person and a Temple sacrifice.
[iv]This refers to a short version of the confessional prayer (vidui) that should be taught to the sick person so they can recite it if necessary. Vidui was considered essential before death in Jewish tradition.
[v]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage is directly from Ma'avar Yabok and references its own internal structure (Chapter 15 of the Fifth Discourse), showing how the book cross-references its own material. | Cf. Psalm 31:6 — The concept of 'entrusting one's soul to God's hand' alludes to Psalm 31:6 'Into Your hand I commit my spirit,' which became a traditional deathbed recitation in Judaism. | Cf. Temple sacrifice rituals — The text draws a parallel between the proper intention for death and the proper intention for ritual sacrifice, suggesting that a righteous death has spiritual power similar to Temple offerings.

For this reason, a person's prayer during their lifetime for "a favorable time"—which refers to death—should be that they merit to sanctify [God's name] like the seraphim, as our Sages stated that one must be careful every night before sleeping [to recite the Shema]. And one who during their lifetime, before entrusting their soul into the hand of their Creator, has elevated their soul through verses of protection and defense, and has satisfied their soul with words of Torah, and sleeps accordingly, will merit at the time of their death that they will receive assistance from heaven to direct their mind to words of holiness,[2] and they will depart amidst matters and rulings concerning salvation and mercy, and then they will go securely on their way. The ill person should strive to fulfill the commandments that are within their power to fulfill, and should pay attention to their dreams, as is discussed in Chapter 14, Discourse 2, and in Chapter 23, Discourse 5, for Moses requested forgiveness from Israel just before his death—and what should mere "wall moss" [ordinary people] do?[3] It is also stated there that the righteous person must willingly accept death, in the mystical sense of "and he shall slaughter it," etc.[4] Chapter 19, Discourse 5 provides

[1]The Hebrew 'יסתלק' (yistaleck) is a euphemism for death that literally means 'to ascend/depart.' It carries connotations of elevation rather than mere cessation, reflecting the Jewish mystical view of death as a transition to a higher state.

[2]The Hebrew phrase 'לכוין דעתו לדברי קדושה' involves the concept of 'kavvanah' (focused intention), which is central to Jewish mystical practice. This suggests that the final moments of life are an opportunity for profound spiritual concentration and elevation.

[3]This rhetorical question employs a classic rabbinic formulation: if even the greatest (Moses) needed to do something, certainly ordinary people should do likewise. It's a 'kal vachomer' (a fortiori) argument common in rabbinic literature.

[4]The Hebrew 'בסוד' (b'sod) literally means 'in the secret of' and indicates a kabbalistic or mystical

[i]The term 'יזנוהו' (yaznuhu) is uncommon and seems to be related to being worthy or meriting something. In this context, it refers to being spiritually prepared to depart from the world while engaged with sacred texts.

[ii]This refers to the kabbalistic concept that the highest form of death is 'death by divine kiss' (mitat neshikah), where the soul joins the angelic chorus sanctifying God's name, similar to the seraphim in Isaiah's vision who call 'Holy, Holy, Holy.'

[iii]This is a rabbinic expression of humility, literally referring to hyssop growing from a wall—a small, insignificant plant compared to mighty cedars. The meaning is: if even Moses, the greatest prophet, needed to seek forgiveness before death, how much more so ordinary people?

[iv]This references Leviticus 1:5 regarding ritual sacrifice, drawing a kabbalistic parallel between the willing acceptance of death and the willingness of a sacrifice to be offered. The author suggests that death, like sacrifice, should be approached with intentional acceptance.

[v]Me'irei Shachar (Illuminators of Dawn) was a prayer collection compiled by the author of Ma'avar Yabok, Aaron Berechia of Modena. The abbreviation נר״ו (nero) means 'may his light shine' and is an honorific used for living scholars.

In "Minchat Aharon"[2] [Aaron's Offering], requests and verses are organized for a person to recite habitually morning, afternoon, and evening to increase supplications. The custom of removing relatives from the room of a dying person is specifically to avoid causing distress through their raised voices, but if they were able to remain at their posts without raising their voices,[3] there is no doubt that the departing one finds pleasure in having living relatives present. See Chapter 28, Discourse 5. Also there is the mystery of paternal inheritance, and the symbolism of a son carrying his father on his shoulder, and likewise 3650R 3655R 3660R interpretation rather than the plain meaning of the text. This reflects the author's approach of finding deeper mystical significances in biblical passages.

[1]This indicates that Aaron Berechia of Modena, the author of Ma'avar Yabok, also compiled a separate prayer collection called Me'irei Shachar (Illuminators of Dawn), which contained prayers specifically designed for the sick and dying.

[2]Minchat Aharon (Aaron's Offering) appears to be another work by the author of Ma'avar Yabok, Aaron Berechia of Modena. The title creates a wordplay with the author's own name.

[3]The Hebrew phrase 'בלא דלויי קול' literally refers to raising or elevating the voice. The author is suggesting that if relatives could maintain emotional composure without loud crying or wailing, their presence could actually comfort the dying person.

[i]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage references multiple chapters and discourses within Ma'avar Yabok itself, showing how the author intended the book to be used as a reference guide with different sections serving specific purposes. The text explicitly directs readers to particular chapters for guidance on different aspects of preparing for death. | Cf. Kiddushin 72a (Talmud) — The reference to 'azovel kir' (wall moss/hyssop) alludes to a Talmudic expression of humility. In this context, it suggests that if even Moses, the greatest prophet, sought forgiveness before death, then ordinary people ('wall moss') certainly should do the same. | Cf. Leviticus 1:5 — The reference to 'and he shall slaughter it' draws a parallel between ritual sacrifice and death, suggesting that just as a sacrifice must be offered willingly and with proper intention, so too should a righteous person accept death willingly with the proper spiritual preparation. | Cf. Shema prayer tradition — The reference to being 'careful every night before sleeping' alludes to the Jewish practice of reciting the Shema before sleep, which includes entrusting one's soul to God. This practice is seen as a daily rehearsal for death, connecting daily spiritual practice to preparation for the final departure. | Cf. Isaiah 6:2-3 — The reference to sanctifying God's name like the seraphim alludes to Isaiah's vision where seraphim proclaim 'Holy, Holy, Holy.' This suggests that the ideal death involves the soul joining the angelic chorus in sanctifying God's name, creating a connection between the earthly deathbed and the heavenly throne room.

[ii]This appears to be another work by the same author (Aaron Berechia of Modena), which contains organized prayers to be recited at various times of day. The title 'Minchat Aharon' (Aaron's Offering) creates a wordplay with the author's own name.

[iii]This provides an important qualification to the Jewish practice of removing family from the deathbed. While the text acknowledges the custom of removing relatives to prevent emotional outbursts that might distress the dying person, it suggests that the quiet presence of family members can actually bring comfort to the departing soul.

The reason for the son closing his father's eyes, and why the son takes precedence, see Chapter 9, Discourse 3. Also there, it explains that one must cover the face of the deceased so that accusers [in heaven] will not look upon his face and forehead, where transgressions are recorded,[1] and this is also the intention behind the ritual tearing of garments.[2] Many more laws of ritual tearing are explained in Chapter 31, Discourse 5, and then they shall say: 3665R 3670R

[A] Or: "May you lie down in peace and sleep in peace" — While the Hebrew uses the future tense

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic belief that a person's sins leave spiritual marks on the face and forehead that can be perceived by spiritual entities after death. This mystical concept explains several deathbed and burial practices.

[2] This refers to keriah, the Jewish practice of tearing one's garments upon learning of the death of a close relative. The text suggests this has a mystical significance beyond its expression of grief.

[3] This opening line from Job is among the most important biblical passages recited at Jewish funerals, acknowledging divine sovereignty over both life and death.

[i] This reflects the kabbalistic belief that spiritual prosecutors (מקטרגים/mekatregim) examine the deceased's face after death, where their transgressions are mystically recorded. Covering the face thus provides spiritual protection for the deceased.

[ii] Cf. Minchat Aharon — The author refers to his own prayer compilation 'Minchat Aharon' (Aaron's Offering), which appears to be a companion text to Ma'avar Yabok containing organized prayers for daily use. | Cf. Chapter 28, Discourse 5 — An internal cross-reference to another part of Ma'avar Yabok that discusses the presence of family members during death. | Cf. Chapter 9, Discourse 3 — An internal cross-reference to an earlier section of Ma'avar Yabok that explains the symbolism and procedure of a son closing his deceased father's eyes. | Cf. Chapter 31, Discourse 5 — An internal cross-reference to another section of Ma'avar Yabok that details the laws of keriah (ritual tearing of garments upon learning of a death).

[iii] The repetition of 'in peace' (בְּשָׁלוֹם) creates a poetic parallelism emphasizing the complete tranquility of the deceased's rest.

[iv] This phrase alludes to messianic expectations, suggesting that the deceased will rest peacefully until the time of resurrection.

[v] Cf. Book of Job 1:21 — This verse from Job is traditionally recited at Jewish funerals and during mourning. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this quote acknowledges divine sovereignty over life and death, affirming acceptance of God's will even in times of loss. | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:4 — This verse affirms divine justice and righteousness even in the face of death, comforting mourners by reminding them that death occurs within God's perfect plan rather than being a random misfortune. | Cf. Isaiah 58:8 — In the context of death, this verse is reinterpreted to suggest that the deceased's righteousness will precede them in the afterlife, and God's presence will 'gather them in' to eternal rest. | Cf. Traditional Jewish burial prayer — The final line appears to be a comforting benediction not directly quoted from scripture but echoing biblical language, offering hope for the soul's peaceful rest until the messianic era when the comforter (possibly referring to Elijah or the Messiah) will come announcing peace.

In Chapter 9 of Discourse 3,[1] when placing the deceased on the ground, one should have the intention that the ground of the world does not receive ritual impurity.[B] If, however, they were to rest the deceased on a bed or upon vessels that are susceptible to ritual impurity, how much more so would the spirits seek out and take hold of the body.[C2] They should cover the deceased with a shroud to conceal them from the forces of judgment,[D] and then recite: 3685R form, in this liturgical context it could be interpreted as a blessing or wish rather than a simple declaration, making 'May you' a potential alternative that captures the benedictory tone of the passage.

[A] Or: "until the Comforter arrives, announcing peace" — Capitalizing 'Comforter' would emphasize its possible messianic interpretation, and 'arrives, announcing' provides a slightly more formal alternative that might better match the solemn liturgical context.

[B] Or: "one should focus on the concept that earth itself cannot become ritually impure" — This more explanatory translation might be clearer to readers unfamiliar with the halakhic principle of 'karka olam' (ground of the world) and its relationship to ritual purity laws.

[C] Or: "negative spiritual entities will be drawn to and attach themselves to the body" — This alternate translation makes the negative nature of the 'ruchot' more explicit, clarifying that these are harmful spiritual forces rather than potentially neutral or positive spirits.

[D] Or: "from the powers of divine judgment" — The term 'kochot hadin' is a kabbalistic concept referring specifically to divine or cosmic judgmental forces, so this more explicit translation might be preferable in a context where the kabbalistic dimension needs to be emphasized.

[1] Ma'avar Yabok is organized into multiple 'ma'amarim' (discourses), each containing numerous chapters. This specific instruction comes from a chapter focused on proper burial procedures.

[2] This employs a common rabbinic logical device known as 'kal vachomer' (how much more so), inferring that if one undesirable outcome occurs in a lesser case, it will certainly occur in the greater case.

[i] This instruction reflects a halakhic principle found in rabbinic literature that land itself cannot become ritually impure, unlike movable objects. In Ma'avar Yabok, this principle takes on additional kabbalistic significance as protection for the soul.

[ii] The term 'ruchot' (spirits) here refers to negative spiritual entities that, according to kabbalistic belief, can attach themselves to the dead body. This concept appears frequently in the Zohar and other mystical texts, where proper burial practices are seen as essential for protecting the deceased from these harmful forces.

[iii] This reveals an important kabbalistic purpose behind the shroud beyond mere modesty—it serves as spiritual protection by concealing the deceased from 'kochot hadin' (forces of judgment), which are divine agencies of strict justice that might otherwise focus their attention on the deceased's transgressions.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 2 — In Discourse 2, the author discusses similar concepts about how proper burial practices affect the soul's journey. This cross-reference helps establish the continuity of these ritual concepts throughout the work. | Cf. Zohar — The concepts about 'kochot hadin' (forces of judgment) and the protection of the deceased from harmful spiritual forces derive from Zoharic literature, which is the primary kabbalistic source for Ma'avar Yabok's approach to death rituals. | Cf. Talmud, Tractate Berakhot 8a — The Talmudic discussion about proper burial practices informs this text, particularly regarding the principle that prompt burial in the ground is preferable for the deceased's dignity and spiritual welfare.

After placing him on the ground,[4] they should recite over him Psalm 23[5] and the "Song of Afflictions" (Psalm 91) with clear articulation of its words. The reason why they were strict about guarding the dead[6] is explained in Chapter 34, Discourse 2, and 3700R

[1]This begins a sequence of biblical verses to be recited during burial after placing the deceased on the ground. The progression moves from an invitation to walk in divine light to an acknowledgment of human mortality.

[2]This verse from Genesis 3:19 is traditionally recited during Jewish burial as earth is cast upon the coffin, acknowledging the physical reality of death while implicitly pointing to the spiritual continuation of the soul.

[3]The indication to repeat the final verse three times (׳ג פעמים) reflects the Jewish burial custom of casting earth upon the coffin three times, symbolizing the finality of physical death.

[4]This refers to the practice of placing the deceased on the ground before burial, which is part of the traditional Jewish burial preparation process. This is done after the washing and purification rituals (tahara) and before placing the body in the coffin.

[5]The well-known psalm beginning 'The Lord is my shepherd,' which contains themes of divine guidance, protection, and eternal dwelling with God—making it particularly appropriate in the context of death and burial.

[6]The Hebrew term for 'guarding' (shemirah) refers to the practice of having people stay with the deceased's body at all times from death until burial, which has both practical and spiritual significance in Jewish tradition.

[i]The threefold divine name ('El, Elohim, YHVH') appears in this order only here and in Joshua 22:22, emphasizing the full spectrum of divine attributes—from judgment to mercy—overseeing the moment of burial.

[ii]This verse from Isaiah 57:2 is traditionally understood as referring specifically to the righteous dead, suggesting that peaceful rest awaits those who have lived upright lives.

[iii]The instruction to repeat this verse three times corresponds to the custom of casting earth upon the coffin three times during burial.

[iv]Cf. Isaiah 2:5 — This opening verse from Isaiah calls the house of Jacob to walk in divine light, establishing a hopeful tone at the beginning of this funeral prayer sequence. | Cf. Psalm 50:1 — This psalm verse affirms God's universal sovereignty and authority, appropriate in the context of acknowledging divine judgment at death. | Cf. Isaiah 57:2 — This verse offers comfort regarding the peaceful rest of the righteous after death, a key theme in Ma'avar Yabok's approach to death as a transition to spiritual rest. | Cf. Genesis 3:19 — This verse recalls God's statement to Adam after the Fall, acknowledging human mortality. In funeral contexts, it is often recited when earth is cast upon the coffin. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 19 of Third Discourse — This prayer appears in Ma'avar Yabok's instructions for what to recite after placing the deceased on the ground. The threefold repetition of 'For dust you are...' reflects the Jewish burial custom of casting earth three times upon the coffin.

[v]Psalm 91 is known in rabbinic tradition as 'Shir shel Pega'im' (Song of Afflictions/Demons) and was believed to have special protective properties against harmful spiritual forces.

[vi]This phrase indicates that the psalm should be recited with clear, precise articulation of each word, reflecting the belief that proper pronunciation was essential for the prayer's spiritual efficacy, especially in contexts related to protection from negative forces.

[vii]The practice of 'guarding the dead' (shemirat ha-met) refers to not leaving the body unattended between death and burial, which had both practical purposes and spiritual significance in protecting the deceased from harmful forces.

[1]This refers to a custom of pouring out all standing water in the vicinity of a death, which has various explanations in Jewish tradition related to purity, announcement of death, or protection from the Angel of Death.

[2]The Hebrew term 'seder rechitzat hamet' refers specifically to the ritual purification (tahara) performed by the burial society (Chevra Kadisha), which involves washing the body according to precise religious protocols.

[3]This is a kabbalistic concept suggesting that the body of a righteous person, particularly a Torah scholar, serves as a container for divine light and holiness during their lifetime. The ritualistic washing described in Chapter 11 is particularly appropriate for such individuals.

[4]The phrase refers to the tahara ritual, the washing and purification of the deceased's body prior to burial, performed by members of the Jewish burial society (Chevra Kadisha).

[5]The instruction that 'the eldest' or most senior member should lead the prayer reflects traditional Jewish hierarchy in ritual matters, where the most knowledgeable or respected individual takes a leadership role.

[i]The custom of pouring out water in a house where death occurred has multiple interpretations in Jewish tradition, including notifying neighbors of the death, symbolic purification, or removing the Angel of Death's influence.

[ii]Cf. Psalm 23 — This psalm, beginning 'The Lord is my shepherd,' is recited over the deceased as part of the burial ritual. Its themes of divine protection and guidance are especially appropriate for one transitioning from this world to the next. | Cf. Psalm 91 — Known as 'Shir shel Pega'im' (Song of Afflictions/Demons), this psalm was believed to have special protective powers against harmful spiritual forces. Its recitation at this stage of the burial process serves to protect the soul during its vulnerable transition. | Cf. Chapter 34, Discourse 2 — This cross-reference directs the reader to a section in Ma'avar Yabok that explains the theological and mystical reasons for guarding the dead, likely related to protecting the body from harmful spiritual forces during the vulnerable period after death. | Cf. Chapter 23 — This reference points to another section in Ma'avar Yabok that explains the practice of pouring water after a death, which likely relates to purification and symbolic separation between the living and the dead.

[iii]This phrase literally means 'sheath/vessel of holiness' and is a kabbalistic concept referring to someone whose body served as a worthy container for divine light and Torah knowledge during their lifetime. It suggests that special ritual attention is appropriate for those who achieved this spiritual status.

[iv]This Aramaic phrase translates approximately as 'for this and that will cause him kindness.' It suggests that the detailed ritual washing and the proper intentions behind it will provide spiritual benefit to the deceased Torah scholar.

[v]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage refers to another section of the same book (Ma'avar Yabok) that contains detailed instructions for the ritual washing (tahara) of the deceased. The cross-reference reveals the book's internal organization, with specific guidance located in particular chapters. | Cf. Zohar — The phrase 'vessel of holiness' (נרתק של קדושה) is reminiscent of Zoharic terminology, where the body is described as a vessel or sheath for the soul. This kabbalistic concept influences the author's approach to the ritual purification of the deceased.

[vi]This refers to the ritual purification (tahara) performed on the deceased body before burial, a sacred duty carried out by the burial society (Chevra Kadisha).

[A] Or: "Prayer to be Recited at the Time of Washing" — This translation is slightly more literal but doesn't explicitly indicate that this refers to the ritual washing of a deceased person (tahara), which would be clear from context to the original audience.

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic worldview of Ma'avar Yabok, where ritual acts in the physical world create corresponding spiritual effects in higher realms. The purification ritual isn't merely physical cleansing but a mystical act that affects the soul's journey.

[2] The opening phrase 'רִבּוֹנוֹ שֶׁל עוֹלָם' (Ribbono shel Olam) is a traditional form of address to God that emphasizes His sovereignty over creation. This mode of address is particularly appropriate in prayers concerning death, where divine sovereignty over life and death is acknowledged.

[3] The formulation 'Your servant, son of Your handmaid' (עַבְדְּךָ בֶּן אֲמָתֶךָ) emphasizes the deceased's relationship to God as both an individual servant and as coming from a lineage of divine service, creating multiple bonds of connection that justify the request for mercy.

[i] This Aramaic phrase reflects the kabbalistic understanding that ritual actions have corresponding effects in higher spiritual realms. The purification of the body is understood to facilitate the purification of the soul in the celestial domains.

[ii] In kabbalistic practice, proper intention (kavvanah) is essential for ritual efficacy. Here, the focus should be specifically on arousing divine mercy for the soul of the deceased.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This citation refers to a specific section of Ma'avar Yabok where instructions for the tahara ritual (purification of the deceased) are provided. The author is indicating where in the larger work this liturgical guidance can be found. | Cf. Zohar — The Aramaic phrases 'בגין דיתרבי ויתוסף רבות קדושה באתר דאצטריך' (in order that holiness may increase and be added in the place where it is needed) echo the language and mystical concepts found in the Zohar, where ritual actions are understood to have metaphysical effects in higher spiritual realms.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This prayer appears in the section of Ma'avar Yabok that deals specifically with tahara (ritual washing of the deceased). The prayer is designed to be recited by the leader of the burial society while performing the purification ritual, to invoke divine mercy for the deceased's soul. | Cf. Zohar — The prayer's references to divine attributes flowing to the deceased's soul reflect Zoharic concepts of channeling divine energies through ritual actions. The Idra Rabba section of the Zohar discusses how divine attributes flow through cosmic channels, which this prayer seeks to activate through the ritual washing.

[v] These placeholder names would be replaced with the actual name of the deceased and his mother's name during the ritual. The use of the mother's name rather than the father's name in prayers for the dead is a common Jewish practice.

[vi] This theological statement—'You give life to the dead and cause the living to die'—reflects the Jewish understanding of God's absolute sovereignty over life and death, which is particularly relevant in this funerary context.

[1]The phrase 'מַשְׂכִּיל אֶל דָּל' (maskil el dal) comes from Psalm 41:2, where considering the poor is linked to divine deliverance in times of trouble. Here it is applied metaphorically to the deceased as one in need of divine consideration and deliverance.

[2]The Hebrew verb 'תַּחֲלִיצֵהוּ' (tachaliẓehu) has connotations of both rescuing and strengthening. In this context, it refers to divine intervention that both rescues the soul from punishment and strengthens it for its journey in the afterlife.

[3]This phrasing echoes Psalm 86:5, connecting this funeral prayer to the biblical tradition of appealing to God's inherent qualities of goodness and forgiveness as the basis for requesting mercy.

[i]This refers to the covenant of circumcision (brit milah). In kabbalistic thought, circumcision is believed to provide spiritual protection that extends beyond death, potentially shielding the soul from punishment in Gehenna.

[ii]This instruction indicates that the previous blessing ('Blessed are You who establishes the covenant with mercy') should be recited twice, and then the prayer continues with the additional words that follow.

[iii]The phrase 'place of the upright' describes the Garden of Eden as the destination for righteous souls. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's consistent theme that proper ritual observance in life leads to a favorable afterlife destination.

[iv]Cf. 1 Samuel 2:9 — This biblical verse is incorporated into the prayer as an assurance that God protects the righteous even in death. In Ma'avar Yabok, this reference supports the theological concept that divine protection continues beyond death, with the deceased's soul being guided safely through its post-mortem journey. | Cf. Covenant of Circumcision (Brit Milah) — This references circumcision as a protecting merit for the deceased. In Jewish mystical thought, particularly as expressed in Ma'avar Yabok, the covenant of circumcision serves as a spiritual protection that extends beyond death, shielding the soul from punishment in the afterlife. | Cf. Genesis 24:65 — This formulation echoes biblical language where lineage is sometimes traced through the mother. In

In this prayer order,[1] there is a specific correction[A] dedicated to the washing of each part of the deceased's body: for the head separately, for the eyes, the face, the beard, and so for each limb from top to bottom. This is why the word "mercy" (rachamim) is mentioned only from the head downward,[2] because from there and below the weak aspects are visible[B] above in the supernal image.[C] One must begin the purification from the head, and in this order proceed from top to bottom. If they focus their intention during the washing on the verses from Song of Songs that allude to the order of the complete divine structure,[D] beginning with "His head is finest gold, etc."

[A] Or: "ritual procedure attributed" — The term 'תקון' in kabbalistic contexts often refers to a ritual procedure or spiritual rectification rather than a 'correction.' 'מיוחס' can mean 'attributed to' or 'associated with' rather than just 'specific.'

[B] Or: "the corresponding aspects manifest" — This phrase is obscure in the original and might be referring to corresponding spiritual elements rather than 'weak aspects.' The word 'דילים' is unusual and my translation is approximate.

[C] Or: "in the divine image above" — This could be more explicitly translated to emphasize the divine nature of the image referred to in kabbalistic thought.

[D] Or: "the arrangement of the complete stature" — 'קומה השלימה' is a kabbalistic concept referring to the complete spiritual 'stature' or structure of divinity. My original translation adds 'divine' for clarity, but a more literal translation might be preferred.

[1] The Hebrew term 'סדר התפלה' refers to the structured liturgical sequence being described in Ma'avar Yabok for the ritual washing of the deceased.

[2] The text is explaining why certain words or formulations appear in the prayer sequence at particular points, connecting the physical ritual with mystical significance.

the context of this prayer, it emphasizes the deceased's complete belonging to God's household, as both a servant himself and the child of one who serves God. | Cf. Jeremiah 32:19 — This phrase is drawn from Jeremiah, where it appears in a context praising God's wisdom and power. In Ma'avar Yabok's funeral prayer, it serves to invoke these divine attributes specifically for mercy toward the deceased, suggesting that God's great wisdom includes knowing how to judge the dead with compassion. | Cf. Garden of Eden (Gan Eden) — This references the Jewish concept of the Garden of Eden as the place where righteous souls dwell after death. In Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework, this represents the highest reward for the deceased—being counted among the righteous and dwelling in divine presence.

[i] This refers to the tahara ritual, the Jewish practice of washing the deceased's body before burial. The text explains that this ritual has specific spiritual significance for each body part.

[ii] This phrase contains obscure terminology but appears to refer to the kabbalistic concept that the human body mirrors the divine structure, with lower aspects corresponding to higher spiritual attributes.

[iii] This refers to the kabbalistic interpretation of Song of Songs 5:11-16, which describes the beloved's body from head to foot. In mystical tradition, these verses are understood as describing the divine structure (Shi'ur Komah) and the sefirot (divine emanations).

[iv] Cf. Song of Songs — The text references verses from Song of Songs that describe the physical attributes of the beloved, particularly beginning with 'His head is finest gold' (5:11). In kabbalistic tradition, these verses are interpreted as describing the divine structure (Shi'ur Komah), and are applied here as a meditation during the ritual washing of the deceased's body, creating a correspondence between human and divine form. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage appears to be elaborating on the tahara (ritual washing) procedures described earlier in Ma'avar Yabok. It specifically provides mystical intentions (kavvanot) to accompany the physical act of washing,

[A] Or: "His appearance is like Lebanon, excellent as the cedars" — The Hebrew 'בָּחוּר' can be translated as 'choice,' 'excellent,' or 'select.' While 'choice' captures the sense of superiority and selectness, 'excellent' might better convey the majesty and grandeur that the comparison to Lebanon and cedars is meant to evoke in this context.

[1] This is the opening phrase of Psalm 133, which celebrates unity among people. In the context of tahara (ritual washing of the deceased), this suggests that each limb should be washed with specific spiritual intention, creating a harmony between the physical act and its spiritual significance.

suggesting that the practitioner should meditate on the correspondence between the human body and the divine structure while performing the ritual.

[i] This entire passage is from Song of Songs 5:11-16, which describes the beloved in elaborate, poetic terms. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this biblical text is recited during tahara (ritual washing of the deceased) as part of a mystical practice where specific verses are associated with different body parts. This practice reflects the kabbalistic concept that the human form mirrors divine structures, and by reciting these verses during purification, the body is dignified and the soul elevated.

[ii] Cf. Song of Songs (Shir HaShirim) 5:11-16 — This is a direct quote from the biblical Song of Songs, which is traditionally interpreted in Jewish mysticism as an allegory of the relationship between God and Israel or the relationship between the soul and the divine. In Ma'avar Yabok, this passage is being used in the context of ritual purification of the deceased, where specific verses from Song of Songs are recited or contemplated for different parts of the body during tahara (ritual washing). The passage describes the beloved in elaborate, poetic terms, using precious materials as metaphors for different body parts. In the context of death rituals, this recitation helps dignify the body of the deceased by connecting it to sacred text and divine imagery. | Cf. Zohar — The use of this Song of Songs passage in death rituals reflects kabbalistic practices influenced by the Zohar, where the human form is understood to mirror divine structures. By reciting these verses during the washing of the deceased, the ritual performers are creating a correspondence between the physical body and spiritual realms, helping to elevate the soul. The Zohar frequently interprets Song of Songs as depicting mystical unions between divine attributes.

[iii] The text is referring to washing each limb of the deceased's body with specific spiritual intention (kavvanah). The phrase "How good and pleasant it is" opens Psalm 133, which was understood in kabbalistic tradition to have mystical significance relating to unity and divine harmony. The instruction suggests that each part of the body should be washed with awareness of its corresponding spiritual counterpart.

In Chapter 12 of the Third Discourse,[4] the types of spices appropriate to place in the purification water and their spiritual intentions will be explained. And when removing the sheet from the deceased,[5] they shall recite: 3790R

[1] This refers to Rabbi Judah the Prince (also known as Rabbi Judah HaNasi or Rabbenu HaKadosh), who compiled the Mishnah in the 2nd century CE. According to tradition, his students were involved in his burial preparations.

[2] A 2nd-century Tannaic sage traditionally regarded as the author of the Zohar, the foundational work of Kabbalah. According to tradition, his disciples attended to his body after his death.

[3] This honorific phrase ("aleihem ha-shalom" in Hebrew) is traditionally added after mentioning deceased righteous individuals, similar to the English "may they rest in peace."

[4] The text uses the abbreviation פרק י״ב מאמר ג׳, a standard reference format in rabbinic literature indicating Chapter 12 of the Third Discourse.

[5] This instruction comes at a specific point in the tahara ritual when the sheet covering the deceased is removed before dressing the body in shrouds (tachrichim).

[i] This reflects the Jewish tradition that it is considered a special honor and final act of loving-kindness (chesed shel emet) for a person's closest associates to personally perform the tahara (ritual washing) for the deceased rather than leaving it to the general members of the burial society.

[ii] The text cites prestigious examples where disciples or family members performed burial preparations: Rabbi Judah the Prince (known as "Rabbeinu HaKadosh"), whose students prepared his body according to Talmudic accounts; Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai (Rashbi), whose disciples attended to him according to tradition; and the biblical patriarch Jacob, whose son Joseph arranged for his preparation for burial.

[iii] Cf. Psalm 133 — The reference to 'Behold how good and pleasant it is' comes from Psalm 133:1, which celebrates unity among brethren. In this context, it's being applied to the tahara ritual (washing of the deceased), suggesting that each limb of the body should be washed with specific intention, connecting the physical act to spiritual meaning. | Cf. Ketubot 103a — The reference to 'our holy Rabbi' (Judah the Prince) alludes to the Talmudic account in Ketubot 103a describing how Rabbi Judah the Prince's students cared for him during his final illness and after his death. | Cf. Zohar III:296b-297a — The reference to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai (Rashbi) seems to allude to the Zohar's account of his death, where his disciples attended to him and participated in his funeral arrangements. | Cf. Genesis 50:1-14 — The reference to 'Jacob our father' alludes to the biblical account in Genesis where Joseph himself tended to his father's body after death, including the Egyptian embalming process.

[iv] In the tahara ritual, specific aromatic substances are added to the purification water both for practical purposes (masking odors) and for spiritual reasons (symbolizing the pleasant fragrance of good deeds that accompany the soul).

[v] The term כוונתם (kavvanatam) refers to the specific mystical intentions and meditations that should accompany the physical action of adding spices to the water, reflecting the kabbalistic belief that proper intention transforms ritual actions into cosmic effects.

[vi] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This is a self-reference within Ma'avar Yabok, directing readers to Chapter 12 of the Third Discourse where the author provides detailed information about the aromatic substances used in the tahara ritual (purification of the deceased) and their mystical significance. | Cf. Tahara ritual — The passage refers to the Jewish purification ritual (tahara) performed on the deceased before burial, which includes washing the body with water containing aromatic substances and removing the sheet covering the body at specific points in the ritual.

[A] Or: "the soiled garments" — The Hebrew 'tzo'im' literally refers to excrement or filth, but in a liturgical context, especially regarding burial practices, 'soiled' may be a more appropriate or dignified translation while still conveying the sense of impurity.

[B] Or: "festival garments" — The term 'machalatzot' in biblical Hebrew can specifically refer to festive or celebratory clothing, not just clean ones. In the context of ritual preparation for burial or the afterlife, this connotation of special ceremonial garments might be significant.

[1] The Hebrew employs the perfect tense ('he'evarti'/'I have removed'), creating a sense of completed action, emphasizing the definitive nature of spiritual purification that the ritual washing represents.

[2] The Hebrew shifts to what appears to be an infinitive construct form ('halbeish') rather than a clear future tense, which could be interpreted as either 'to clothe you' or '[I] will clothe you'. I've translated it as a future action to maintain the sequence of divine promise.

[3] The tahara (purification ritual) traditionally begins with washing the head first, as it's considered the most important part of the body, corresponding to the higher spiritual realms in Kabbalistic thought.

[4] The term 'הגדול שבהם' can refer either to the eldest person or to the most knowledgeable or respected member of the burial society performing the tahara ritual. Leadership in this sacred task is assigned based on wisdom and experience rather than merely chronological age.

[i] This verse from Zechariah 3:4 is recited when removing the deceased's clothing before the ritual washing (tahara). It creates a theological parallel between the removal of physical garments and the purification of the soul.

[ii] The term 'machalatzot' derives from the root meaning 'to withdraw' or 'remove' and refers to pure, clean garments that replace the soiled ones, symbolizing spiritual transformation. In Ma'avar Yabok's context of burial preparation, this represents the deceased's spiritual purification.

[iii] Cf. Zechariah 3:4 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this biblical verse is used in the context of preparing the deceased for burial, specifically when removing the deceased's clothes before ritual washing (tahara). The verse establishes a metaphorical connection between the physical removal of clothing and the spiritual removal of sin, suggesting that the tahara ritual has transformative spiritual effects beyond mere physical cleansing. | Cf. Mishnah Shabbat 23:5 — By invoking this biblical verse during the tahara ritual, Ma'avar Yabok connects the practical act of changing the deceased's garments to the ancient Temple service and priestly purification. This creates a spiritual framework where the burial society members (Chevra Kadisha) are performing a sacred purification ritual analogous to the priests preparing for divine service.

[iv] This refers to the beginning of the tahara ritual (ritual washing of the deceased), which follows a specific order starting with the head. In Kabbalistic thought, the head corresponds to the highest divine emanations.

[v] This call-and-response format creates a communal ritual action that is believed to be more spiritually powerful than individual recitation. The 'eldest' or most respected person leads, reflecting the hierarchical structure maintained even in ritual service to the deceased.

[vi] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage appears in the section of Ma'avar Yabok that provides detailed instructions for the tahara ritual (purification of the deceased's body). The book gives specific guidance on what prayers to recite at each stage of the ritual washing, integrating practical procedures with kabbalistic significance.

[A] Or: "A spring of gardens, a well of living waters streaming from Lebanon." — The Hebrew 'ma'ayan' could be translated as either 'fountain' or 'spring,' while 'nozlim' could be rendered as either 'flowing' or 'streaming.' This alternate translation maintains the meaning while using slightly different English vocabulary that some might find more poetic or natural.

[B] Or: "and by a spirit of purging fire" — The Hebrew 'ba'er' connotes burning specifically for purification purposes. The expanded translation 'purging fire' more explicitly conveys this sense of cleansing through fire, which is implied in the original Hebrew but might be missed in the more literal 'burning.'

[1] The use of first-person divine speech in this final verse is significant. While human hands perform the tahara ritual, the ultimate purification is understood to be performed by God. This reflects the Jewish theological principle that humans act as God's partners in sacred work.

[2] This refers specifically to the tahara, the ritual washing and purification of the deceased's body, which is a central element of traditional Jewish burial preparations.

[3] The Hebrew 'hagadol shebahem' could refer to the eldest person, but more likely refers to the most senior in knowledge, experience, or authority within the burial society.

[i] This verse from Song of Songs begins a sequence of biblical verses recited during the tahara ritual (washing of the deceased). The three verses together create a progression from the source of pure water (Lebanon) to the divine act of cleansing (the Lord washing away filth) to the promise of complete purification.

[ii] The 'spirit of judgment' and 'spirit of burning' have kabbalistic significance in Ma'avar Yabok, representing divine attributes that purify the soul. Physical washing symbolizes this spiritual purification process.

[iii] This collection of verses is recited specifically when pouring the nine measures of water (tisha kabin) over the body during tahara, considered equivalent to ritual immersion (tevilah) for the deceased.

[iv] Cf. Song of Songs 4:15 — In this context, the verse from Song of Songs is repurposed from its original romantic meaning to represent spiritual purification. The 'fountain of gardens' symbolizes the purifying waters used in the tahara ritual (washing of the deceased). | Cf. Isaiah 4:4 — This verse from Isaiah provides the theological foundation for the ritual washing, connecting physical purification with spiritual cleansing. In Ma'avar Yabok, it suggests that the tahara ritual is not merely physical but represents divine judgment and purification of the soul. | Cf. Ezekiel 36:25 — The verse from Ezekiel completes the spiritual framework by presenting purification as a divine act. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it suggests that while humans perform the physical tahara, the true spiritual cleansing comes from God, who removes impurities and prepares the soul for its journey.

[v] This refers to the most senior, knowledgeable, or respected member of the burial society (Chevra Kadisha) present at the tahara ritual, who is designated to lead the prayers and guide the procedure.

[vi] The term 'seder' (order/procedure) refers to the entire ritual washing process, which follows a carefully prescribed sequence of actions accompanied by specific prayers and biblical verses.

[vii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This instruction appears in the context of tahara (ritual washing of the deceased), which is extensively detailed throughout Ma'avar Yabok. The author provides specific liturgical instructions for this sacred ritual, emphasizing the communal nature of the

And he shall recite this verse three times:

[1]The Hebrew 'seder' (order/procedure) indicates that the washing ritual follows a prescribed sequence with specific prayers and actions, all following this call-and-response pattern.

[2]This passage is recited during the ritual washing of the deceased (tahara), creating a poignant context where the community appeals to God as the ultimate savior even in death, which is viewed as the ultimate "time of trouble."

[3]While the original biblical verse addressed the living, in Ma'avar Yabok this command is recited during the purification of the deceased, suggesting that the ritual washing continues the process of sanctification even after death.

[4]The passage concludes with divine assurance that righteousness comes from God, emphasizing that the deceased's ultimate judgment rests with divine mercy rather than human actions alone. This provides comfort to both the deceased's soul and the living who perform the tahara ritual.

practice with call-and-response elements led by the most senior person present. | Cf. Chevra Kadisha manuals — This instruction follows the format common in burial society (Chevra Kadisha) manuals, where specific roles are assigned to participants in ritual washing ceremonies. The designation of the 'eldest' or most senior person to lead prayers reflects the hierarchical structure typical in these sacred societies.

[i]The word "mikveh" (hope) creates a deliberate wordplay with the ritual bath (also called "mikveh") used for purification, suggesting that the ritual washing of the deceased connects them to God, Israel's true hope and salvation.

[ii]This verse from Leviticus, originally about ritual purity in life, is repurposed here to suggest that the tahara ritual spiritually sanctifies the deceased, preparing them for their return to the holy divine presence.

[iii]In the context of tahara, this verse takes on additional meaning as a form of spiritual protection for the deceased during their soul's journey, warding off negative forces that might attempt to prevent their peaceful transition.

[iv]Cf. Jeremiah 14:8 — The opening line is a direct quote from Jeremiah addressing God during a time of drought and distress. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse takes on additional meaning as it's recited during ritual purification of the deceased, suggesting that even in death, God remains Israel's hope and savior. | Cf. Leviticus 20:7 — This verse from Leviticus on ritual purity takes on deeper meaning in the context of tahara (ritual purification of the dead). It suggests that the ritual washing isn't merely physical but aims to restore spiritual purity to the deceased. | Cf. Isaiah 54:17 — This verse from Isaiah offers spiritual protection to the deceased, suggesting that no negative forces can harm the soul of one who has been properly prepared through ritual purification. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's focus on the soul's journey after death, this verse promises divine protection during that transition.

[v]This abbreviation stands for "gimmel pe'amim" meaning "three times." The threefold repetition of verses is common in Jewish liturgical practice, especially in rituals connected to protection or sanctification.

[vi]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This is a standard liturgical instruction that appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok, directing the reader to repeat a specific verse three times. Such threefold repetitions are common in Jewish ritual practice, especially in contexts involving protection from negative spiritual forces or emphasizing particularly important biblical passages.

In Chapter 13 of the Third Discourse, the intention for dressing the deceased in his garments according to the proper order[1] is explained: At the time of wrapping him in the prayer shawl, they should recite the verse written below.[2] And it is good to place the prayer shawl over his head if that was his custom during his lifetime. Regarding the tying of the ritual fringes garment[3] (tzitzit) on the deceased, see Chapter 26 of the Fifth Discourse. 3830R

[1]The concept of 'seder' (order) is significant in Jewish ritual, implying not just sequence but divine ordering. In burial preparation, this ordered dressing reflects cosmic harmony and respect for divine law.

[2]Interestingly, the verse mentioned is not actually included in this excerpt, suggesting this is part of a larger text where the verse appears immediately following this instruction.

[3]The question of whether a deceased should be buried wearing tzitzit (ritual fringes) has been debated in rabbinic literature, with various customs developing across different Jewish communities. This text acknowledges this complexity by referring the reader to a more detailed discussion elsewhere in the book.

[i]The text refers back to a previously mentioned chapter where this practice is explained in detail. This demonstrates the book's structure as a comprehensive reference guide for burial practices, with cross-references between sections.

[ii]This refers to the ritual practice of rubbing or rolling eggs on the head of the deceased during the tahara (purification) process. Eggs are symbolic in Jewish mourning rituals, representing the cycle of life and death, and are used in various purification contexts.

[iii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This is a cross-reference to another section of Ma'avar Yabok where the author explains the ritual practice of rubbing eggs on the head of the deceased during the tahara (purification) process. This practice appears to be part of the ritual washing and preparation of the body.

[iv]The term 'kavvanat' (intention) indicates that the text is not merely describing physical actions, but also the proper spiritual focus or meditation that should accompany these ritual acts.

[v]The phrase 'al ha-seder' (according to the proper order) refers to the specific ritual sequence for dressing the deceased, indicating that there is a prescribed order for the garments that must be maintained for proper ritual preparation.

[vi]This instruction demonstrates an important principle in Jewish burial customs: maintaining the deceased's personal religious practices. The text specifically notes that how the tallit is positioned should reflect the individual's practice during life.

[vii]Cf. Chapter 13 of the Third Discourse of Ma'avar Yabok — This passage explicitly references a specific chapter in Ma'avar Yabok that contains detailed instructions on the proper ritual dressing of the deceased, particularly regarding the significance of the prayer shawl (tallit). | Cf. Chapter 26 of the Fifth Discourse of Ma'avar Yabok — This passage explicitly references another chapter in Ma'avar Yabok that contains instructions regarding the tying of ritual fringes (tzitzit) on the deceased, showing how the text provides cross-references to its own sections for more detailed guidance on specific aspects of burial preparation.

[A] Or: "my soul shall delight in my God" — The Hebrew verb 'tagel' (תָּגֵל) can be translated as

[4] The Hebrew רָאשֵׁי בְשָׂמִים literally means 'heads of spices' or 'chief spices,' referring to the most precious or principal aromatic substances. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's tahara ritual, these spices collectively represent the spiritual perfection that awaits the righteous in the afterlife.

[1] This refers to the ritual dressing of the deceased in burial shrouds (tachrichim) as part of the tahara (purification) process performed by the Jewish burial society (Chevra Kadisha).

[2] This phrase indicates that what follows is not merely a prayer but an explanation of the deeper kabbalistic meaning behind the physical act of clothing the deceased. In Jewish mystical thought, the soul is believed to wear 'garments' in the afterlife that correspond to one's Torah study, good deeds, and spiritual achievements in this world.

[3] This passage appears in Ma'avar Yabok as part of the ritual for dressing the deceased in shrouds (tachrichim). The joyful language of being clothed in salvation creates a powerful contrast with the somber act of preparing a body for burial, suggesting that death is a transition to spiritual elevation rather than merely an ending.

[viii] This verse is recited during the tahara ritual when dressing the deceased in shrouds. The aromatic substances mentioned symbolize spiritual purification and divine acceptance. Each spice is associated with different spiritual qualities in kabbalistic tradition, and their collective use represents the hope that the soul will be received in the Garden of Eden surrounded by spiritual fragrance.

[ix] Cf. Song of Songs 4:14 — This verse from Song of Songs is recited during the tahara ritual (ritual purification of the deceased) in Ma'avar Yabok. When dressing the deceased in shrouds, this verse is spoken to symbolically clothe the departed in spiritual fragrance and purity. In the original biblical context, the verse describes the beloved's body as a fragrant garden, but in this funeral context, it takes on additional meaning as a blessing that the deceased should be received in the Garden of Eden with all spiritual sweetness and purity.

[i] This instruction occurs within the tahara (ritual purification) process, specifically after the washing of the body and the dressing of the deceased in burial shrouds (tachrichim). The subsequent prayer establishes a theological connection between the physical shrouds and the spiritual garments the soul will wear in the World to Come.

[ii] The phrase 'for the mystical significance of donning spiritual garments' reflects the kabbalistic understanding in Ma'avar Yabok that ritual actions in this world create corresponding spiritual realities in higher worlds. The physical act of dressing the deceased is understood to have a parallel spiritual effect, clothing the soul in garments of salvation and righteousness for its journey in the afterlife.

[iii] Cf. Isaiah 61:10 — This verse is used in the context of dressing the deceased in shrouds, creating a parallel between physical burial garments and the spiritual garments that the soul will wear in the afterlife. The image of the bridegroom adorned with a garland and the bride adorned with jewels represents the soul's adorned state in the World to Come. | Cf. Zechariah 3:5 — This passage from Zechariah about placing a pure headdress on the High Priest Joshua symbolizes the spiritual purification of the deceased. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it represents the removal of sin and impurity as the soul transitions to the afterlife. | Cf. Isaiah 4:2 — This verse connects burial preparations to the broader theme of resurrection and renewal. The image of the earth bringing forth its growth parallels the soul's growth and flourishing in the World to Come after death. | Cf. Isaiah 58:11 — This verse is used to express hope for the deceased's soul—that it will be continuously guided by God, satisfied in spiritual abundance, and strengthened. The metaphor of becoming like a watered garden represents the soul flourishing in the divine presence after death.

[iv] This opening verse from Isaiah 61:10 introduces a passage about spiritual transformation represented through clothing metaphors. In the Jewish mystical tradition, the soul's transition after death is often depicted as a change of garments.

either 'exult' or 'delight.' While 'exult' conveys the intensity of joy more strongly, 'delight' might be more accessible to modern readers.

[A]Or: "as a bridegroom priests himself with glory" — The Hebrew 'yekhahen' (יְכַהֵן) uses a priestly verb form that is difficult to render directly in English. This more literal translation preserves the priestly association but might be less clear to readers unfamiliar with this linguistic connection.

[B]Or: "and make your bones vigorous" — The Hebrew 'yachalitz' (יַחֲלִיץ) has connotations of liberation, invigoration, and strengthening. This alternate translation captures more of the sense of renewed vitality.

[1]The presence of the angel in this context symbolizes divine supervision of the soul's transition. In Jewish funeral practices, the body is traditionally not left alone before burial, mirroring this spiritual supervision on a physical level.

[2]In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this universal flourishing of righteousness connects to the concept that properly performed death rituals have cosmic significance, affecting not just the individual soul but contributing to the repair of the world (tikkun olam).

[3]This powerful image of perpetual nourishment serves in Ma'avar Yabok as a promise of continuous spiritual sustenance for the soul in the afterlife, providing comfort to both the deceased and the mourners.

[v]The verb 'yekhahen' (יְכַהֵן) derives from the same root as 'kohen' (priest), suggesting that the adorning has a sacred, priestly quality. This creates a connection between physical clothing and spiritual elevation.

[i]This verse from Zechariah 3:5 describes the purification of Joshua the High Priest. The 'pure diadem/turban' was part of the priestly garments and symbolized holiness and ritual purity.

[ii]The garden imagery here creates a metaphorical connection between physical growth and spiritual flourishing, a theme particularly relevant in the context of death and resurrection.

[iii]The strengthening of bones has particular significance in Jewish burial practices and beliefs about resurrection, as bones were considered the indestructible core from which the body would be rebuilt in the revival of the dead.

[iv]Cf. Isaiah 61:10-11 — This passage quotes directly from Isaiah 61:10-11, a text of comfort and restoration. In Ma'avar Yabok, it appears after the ritual washing and dressing of the deceased in shrouds, establishing a parallel between the physical preparation of the body and spiritual garments of salvation that await the soul in the afterlife. | Cf. Zechariah 3:5-6 — This reference quotes from Zechariah's vision of Joshua the High Priest being cleansed and reclothed, symbolizing purification from sin. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this connects the deceased's physical preparation (tahara) with spiritual purification of the soul. | Cf. Isaiah 58:11 — This final verse comes from Isaiah 58, describing God's promises to those who practice true righteousness including proper fasting and charity. In Ma'avar Yabok, it functions as a prayer for the soul's continual nourishment and flourishing in the afterlife.

בפרק י״ד מאמר ג׳ מתבאר כוונת שימת המת בארגז שהוא להטמין גופו מכח בעלי הדין[i] [ii] ואז יאמרו:

And in Chapter 14 of Discourse 3,[A] the intention behind placing the deceased in a coffin[B] is explained: it is to conceal the body from the forces of judgment.[C] At that moment, they shall recite:

וְלֹא יָבוֹאוּ לִרְאוֹת כְּבַלַּע אֶת הַקֹּדֶשׁ[iii] וָמֵתוּ:[iv] [v]

And they shall not come to see the holy things being swallowed up,[1] lest they die.[2]

[C] Or: "in Chapter 14 of the Third Discourse" — This alternative translation makes it clearer that this refers to a specific section of Ma'avar Yabok, using a more formal designation for the discourse number.

[D] Or: "the mystical purpose of placing the deceased in a coffin" — This alternative emphasizes the kabbalistic dimension implied by the term 'כוונת' (kavvanah/intention), which in this context refers to the spiritual significance behind the physical action rather than merely its practical purpose.

[A] Or: "to hide the body from the power of the prosecuting angels" — This translation more explicitly identifies 'בעלי הדין' as referring to prosecuting angels or negative spiritual forces in kabbalistic thought that might harm the deceased's soul.

[1] This is a direct quotation from Numbers 4:20, where the original context refers to the Kohathites being forbidden from viewing the covering of the sacred vessels of the Tabernacle. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is repurposed for burial rituals, drawing a parallel between the biblical sacred objects and the deceased's body, both requiring proper covering and respectful treatment.

[2] The severe consequence mentioned here (death) reflects the gravity with which both the biblical text and Ma'avar Yabok treat boundaries between sacred and profane. In the context of burial rituals, this verse emphasizes the sacred nature of the body and the spiritual importance of proper burial procedures.

[i] According to the kabbalistic worldview presented in Ma'avar Yabok, the deceased's body requires protection from spiritual forces that might harm the soul during its transition. The coffin serves as both physical container and spiritual shield against these 'forces of judgment' (בעלי הדין), which in Jewish mystical thought are angelic beings that prosecute the soul after death.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 14, Discourse 3 — This refers to an earlier section of the same book that contains a detailed explanation of why the body is placed in a coffin. According to kabbalistic thought presented in Ma'avar Yabok, the coffin serves as spiritual protection for the deceased's body, shielding it from negative spiritual forces (בעלי הדין) that might otherwise harm the soul during its transition. | Cf. Zohar, Vayechi — The Zohar in Parashat Vayechi discusses burial practices and the spiritual significance of the coffin, including how it protects the body. This section of Ma'avar Yabok likely draws on these Zoharic teachings.

[iii] This phrase literally means "when the holy things are swallowed up" or "as the holy is covered/concealed." In its original biblical context (Numbers 4:20), it refers to the covering of sacred vessels during transport to protect them from profane view. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is repurposed in the context of burial rituals, drawing a parallel between the biblical prohibition against viewing sacred objects being covered and the importance of properly covering/concealing the deceased's body.

[iv] The stark warning "lest they die" in the original biblical context established boundaries around sacred space. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's burial rituals, this verse is cited after the deceased has been placed in a coffin, suggesting a theological connection between proper treatment of the dead body and the biblical concept of sacred boundaries.

[v] Cf. Numbers 4:20 — Ma'avar Yabok applies this biblical verse to burial rituals, suggesting a parallel between the sacred objects of the Tabernacle and the deceased's body. Just as viewing the holy objects inappropriately could lead to death, improper treatment of the deceased's body has serious spiritual consequences. The verse is quoted immediately after instructions for placing the body in the coffin, emphasizing the importance of proper covering and treatment of the dead. | Cf. Zohar, Parashat Emor — The use of this verse reflects the Kabbalistic concept that the human body, even after death, retains its sanctity as a vessel that once contained the divine soul. Just as the holy vessels of the Tabernacle required proper covering and handling, so too does the human body require respectful treatment in death. The parallel suggests that improper viewing or handling of the deceased constitutes a spiritual violation similar to inappropriately viewing the sacred Tabernacle vessels.

[1]The repetition of sacred formulas three times is a common practice in Jewish ritual, believed to strengthen their efficacy. This reflects the special honor accorded to religious leaders or community figures even after death.

[2]The Hebrew word 'aron' literally means 'ark' or 'chest' but in this context refers specifically to the coffin in which the deceased is placed. This section continues the meticulous sequence of prayers prescribed by Ma'avar Yabok for each stage of the burial preparation process.

[3]The original employs the term 'gibborim' (mighty ones), which has both military and spiritual connotations in Hebrew, suggesting not merely physical strength but spiritual power as well.

[4]The Priestly Blessing forms a central liturgical element in Jewish ritual. Its inclusion in burial contexts represents an adaptation from its original Temple and synagogue usage to provide spiritual protection for the deceased.

[5]The olive tree imagery carries rich symbolic meaning in Jewish tradition, representing fertility, longevity, and resilience—all qualities hoped for in the spiritual afterlife of the deceased.

[vi]This refers to a person of importance, likely a Torah scholar, community leader, or someone of high spiritual or communal standing.

[i]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The text shows special ritual considerations for people of high status, a common theme throughout Jewish burial practices. The instruction to repeat the verse three times for important individuals suggests that repetition was seen as intensifying the spiritual protection or honor accorded to the deceased.

[ii]This section provides instructions for what prayers to recite after the deceased has been placed in the coffin, continuing the sequence of ritual actions during Jewish burial preparations.

[iii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 14, Discourse 3 — This earlier section of Ma'avar Yabok likely contains the kabbalistic explanations for why the deceased is placed in a coffin and the spiritual meaning of this action, explaining how it protects the soul from negative spiritual forces. | Cf. Song of Songs 3:7-8 — The subsequent biblical quote about 'Solomon's bed' surrounded by sixty mighty warriors is interpreted as a metaphor for the coffin that protects the deceased, with the warriors representing spiritual protections against harmful forces during the soul's journey.

[iv]This reference to 'Solomon's bed' (from Song of Songs 3:7-8) is used metaphorically in the context of Ma'avar Yabok to represent the coffin of the deceased. The sixty valiant warriors symbolize protective angels or divine forces that guard the soul during its transition.

[v]The phrase 'fear in the nights' refers to spiritual dangers that might threaten the soul after death. In the context of burial rituals, this verse is recited to invoke divine protection against these forces.

[vi]The inclusion of the Priestly Blessing (Numbers 6:24-26) in burial rituals reflects the belief that the deceased requires divine blessing, protection, and peace during the soul's journey after death.

[vii]This verse from Hosea 14:7 is included to express the hope that the deceased's memory and spiritual legacy will continue to spread like a pleasant fragrance, even after death.

[6]This unusual construction in the original Hebrew has been the subject of much rabbinic commentary. I've preserved the literal wording rather than smoothing it to 'fourteen spouts' to maintain its mystical significance related to the sevenfold divine attributes.

[1]This is a reference to a Talmudic teaching from Bechorot 31b that when a deceased person's teachings or words are quoted after their death, it brings merit to them in the afterlife, as if their lips continue to move in the grave. This concept is based on an interpretation of Song of Songs 7:10. Within the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this suggests that reciting these prayers not only aids the soul of the recently deceased but also brings merit to previous scholars and sages.

[2]The 'great mountain' in this funerary context symbolizes the obstacles facing the soul in its journey after death. The original passage in Zechariah referred to obstacles in rebuilding the Temple, but has been repurposed here to address spiritual barriers.

[i]This vision of the golden menorah and olive trees from Zechariah 4:2-3 represents divine light and continuous spiritual nourishment. In the context of burial rituals, it symbolizes the hope that the deceased's soul will be sustained by divine light in the afterlife.

[ii]Cf. Song of Songs 3:7-8 — This text from Song of Songs is recontextualized in Ma'avar Yabok as a burial prayer. While originally describing King Solomon's protected palanquin, here it symbolizes divine protection for the deceased's coffin and soul during its transition to the afterlife. | Cf. Numbers 6:24-26 — The Priestly Blessing, originally given to Aaron and his sons to bless the people of Israel, is adapted here for burial rituals to invoke divine protection for the soul's journey after death. | Cf. Hosea 14:7 — This prophetic text, originally describing Israel's future restoration, is repurposed in burial contexts to express hope for the deceased's continued spiritual flourishing in the afterlife. | Cf. Zechariah 4:2-3 — Zechariah's vision of the menorah and olive trees, originally representing God's provision for the rebuilding of the Temple, is reinterpreted here as symbolizing divine light and spiritual sustenance for the soul in the afterlife.

[iii]The phrase 'dovev siftei yeshenim' (causing the lips of those who sleep to speak) reflects the rabbinic belief that when someone's teachings are cited after their death, it brings merit to the deceased in the afterlife. In Ma'avar Yabok, this note indicates that the following prayers in praise of the Supreme Glory are meant not only to assist the soul of the deceased but also to honor previous scholars and sages whose teachings are being recited.

[iv]Cf. Bechorot, Chapter 5 — The text references the Talmudic tractate Bechorot, chapter 5, which contains the phrase 'causing the lips of those who sleep to speak' (dovev siftei yeshenim). This phrase appears in the context of discussing how reciting teachings in the name of a deceased scholar brings merit to them in the afterlife, as if their lips continue to move in the grave. | Cf. Song of Songs 7:10 — The phrase 'dovev siftei yeshenim' (causing the lips of those who sleep to speak) comes from Song of Songs 7:10, which reads 'Your palate is like the best wine that goes down smoothly for my beloved, moving gently the lips of sleepers.' In rabbinic interpretation, this verse was understood to mean that when someone's teachings are repeated after their death, it's as if their lips continue to move in the grave, bringing them merit in the afterlife.

[v]The repetition of the word 'grace' (חן חן) emphasizes the divine favor requested for the soul's journey. This comes from Zechariah 4:7 where it refers to the Temple's cornerstone, but in this deathbed context, it refers to the soul as a precious stone being elevated to the divine realm.

[1] This compilation of biblical verses creates a spiritual progression: first addressing obstacles to the soul's journey (the mountain becoming a plain), then invoking divine power, and finally affirming God's glory filling all creation—a recurring pattern in Ma'avar Yabok's prayers for the deceased.

[2] The original term 'כתפים' literally means 'shoulders,' but in this funeral context refers specifically to the pallbearers who carry the deceased on their shoulders.

[3] The Hebrew uses a concise construction 'בִּנְסֹעַ' (literally 'in the journeying of') which I've expanded slightly for clarity in English.

[i] The phrase "tzorchei talmid chacham" refers to the ritual preparation of a deceased Torah scholar's body for burial, including washing, purification, and dressing in shrouds. The text suggests these rituals should ideally be performed in the scholar's place of study.

[ii] This phrase directs the reader to consult the full explanation elsewhere in the text. Such cross-references are common throughout Ma'avar Yabok, as the work is organized as a reference manual.

[iii] The term "sod" (secret) indicates that the author will provide a mystical/kabbalistic explanation of the practice of accompanying the deceased to burial, beyond its practical or legal dimensions.

[iv] Cf. Chapter 20 of the Second Discourse — The reference indicates that these prohibitions have both practical and mystical reasons that are elaborated in detail elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok. | Cf. Chapter 26 of the Second Discourse — The author refers readers to this section for a deeper understanding of the spiritual dimensions of the funeral procession beyond its practical requirements.

[v] The text gives special treatment to a deceased Torah scholar (talmid chacham), reflecting the Jewish tradition of showing particular honor to learned individuals even after death.

[vi] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 15, Discourse 3 — This reference directs the reader to an earlier section of Ma'avar Yabok that contains complete instructions for the ritual of carrying the deceased to burial. The current text is providing specific prayers to be recited at that moment.

[vii] This verse from Numbers establishes a parallel between the sacred transport of the Tabernacle in ancient Israel and the transport of the deceased. Just as only Levites could handle the Tabernacle, the text suggests that only designated individuals (the burial society) should handle the deceased's body, maintaining its sacred dignity.

[vi] Cf. Book of Zechariah — This verse from Zechariah is quoted here as part of a prayer for divine assistance during the transition of death. In its original context, the verse refers to obstacles being removed for Zerubbabel in rebuilding the Temple, but in Ma'avar Yabok, it symbolizes the hope that obstacles to the soul's peaceful journey will be removed. | Cf. Book of Numbers — These verses from Numbers ("Let the power of the Lord be great" and "all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the LORD") were originally spoken by Moses when pleading for divine forgiveness after Israel's lack of faith. In this deathbed context, they serve as a plea for divine mercy and the manifestation of God's greatness in facilitating the soul's transition.

Having examined the Zohar portion of Beshalach, the two verses cited here possess special protective 3920R

[1] The Hebrew term 'הַזָּר' (ha-zar) specifically means 'the stranger' or 'non-Levite' in this context, referring to anyone not authorized to handle sacred objects.
[2] In the context of funeral practices, this verse serves as a spiritual protection, asking that any negative forces be dispersed as the deceased is transported to burial.
[3] This passage from Psalm 91 takes on special significance in Ma'avar Yabok, as it provides a vivid image of angels carrying the soul safely on its journey after death.
[4] This anthropomorphic description of God as a warrior appears in the Song at the Sea (Exodus 15:3). In the funeral context, it emphasizes God's power to overcome the obstacles of death and guide the soul to its resting place.
[5] The Hebrew 'תַּחֲרִישׁוּן' has connotations beyond mere silence, suggesting respectful stillness and trust in divine action. In the funeral context, it instructs mourners to maintain reverent silence during the transport of the deceased.

[i] This verse was traditionally recited when the Ark was transported in ancient Israel. In the context of a funeral, it serves to disperse negative spiritual forces that might impede the soul's journey, with the deceased's body metaphorically compared to the sacred Ark.
[ii] These verses from Psalm 91, known as 'Shir Shel Pega'im' (Song of Afflictions/Demons), are believed to have special protective properties against harmful spiritual forces. Their inclusion in the funeral ritual creates spiritual protection for both the deceased and those carrying the body.
[iii] This final verse instructs mourners to maintain respectful silence while God fights spiritual battles on behalf of the deceased. It reflects the Jewish belief that at sacred moments of transition, human silence allows divine action to manifest more fully.
[iv] Cf. Numbers 1:51 — This first verse is quoted directly from Numbers 1:51, establishing the sacred status of the Tabernacle and the exclusive right of the Levites to handle it. | Cf. Numbers 10:35 — This verse from Numbers 10:35 was recited by Moses whenever the Ark set out during Israel's wilderness journeys. In Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as a protective prayer when moving the deceased, with the Ark representing the soul's journey. | Cf. Psalm 91:11-12 — These verses from the 'Song of Afflictions' (Psalm 91) are included specifically for their protective qualities, invoking angelic guardianship for the deceased's soul during its transition. | Cf. Exodus 15:3 — This declaration of God as a warrior comes from the Song at the Sea (Exodus 15). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it invokes divine power to overcome the obstacles that might impede the soul's journey. | Cf. Exodus 14:14 — This final verse from Exodus 14:14 completes the protective formula, assuring that God will fight on behalf of the deceased's soul while humans maintain reverential silence during this sacred transition.
[v] The author directs readers to a specific section of the Zohar (the primary text of Jewish mysticism) related to the Torah portion of Beshalach (Exodus 13:17-17:16). This reference serves to establish authoritative support for the ritual practices being described.

אמרי בהו יושבי על מדין:[i][ii]

powers,[A] and those who dwell in contemplation of judgment say many additional things about them.[B]

יכוונו הנושאים את המטה כשמתחלפים מזה לזה להבריח מעליו רוחות הנקרא פורחות[iii] ויכוונו לפחות לעמוד קודם שישימו אותו בקברו ז׳ פעמים:[iv] ומה טוב שכל המתחלפים תחת הארגז יאמר כל אחד מהם פסוקים הנזכרים למעלה ויוסיף פסוק זה:[v]

Those carrying the bier,[1] when they exchange with one another, should have the intention of driving away from him the spirits called "flyers,"[2] and they should at least intend to stop [and rest the coffin] seven times[3] before they place him in his grave. And how good it is that all those who take turns carrying the coffin should each recite the verses mentioned above and add this verse:

[A] Or: "the special virtue and power of these two verses" — The Hebrew word 'segulah' specifically refers to a spiritual remedy or protective measure with mystical properties, while 'koach' refers to power or efficacy. This alternate translation more precisely captures the technical mystical meaning of these terms in the context of Kabbalistic literature.

[B] Or: "and the sages who sit in judgment say much more about them" — The phrase 'yoshvei al madin' could refer specifically to rabbinic authorities who make legal judgments, rather than to those engaged in spiritual contemplation of divine judgment. The context suggests these are authoritative interpretations from scholarly sources.

[1] The Hebrew 'המטה' literally means 'the bed' but in this context refers specifically to the funeral bier or coffin. This terminology reflects the Jewish conception of death as sleep, with burial as placing the deceased to rest.

[2] I've translated 'רוחות הנקרא פורחות' as 'spirits called "flyers"' to maintain the technical term while making the meaning clear. In kabbalistic literature, these are a specific class of harmful spiritual entities that are attracted to the deceased during transport.

[3] I've added '[and rest the coffin]' for clarity, as the Hebrew 'לעמוד' (to stand) in this context specifically means to stop and set down the coffin temporarily before continuing the procession.

[i] This phrase literally means 'those who sit in judgment' and refers to rabbinic authorities or sages who render halakhic (Jewish legal) decisions. In Kabbalistic contexts, it often refers to those who have mastered both legal and mystical dimensions of Torah.

[ii] Cf. Zohar, Beshalach — The Zohar in Beshalach discusses how certain biblical verses create spiritual protection when recited. The verses referred to here are likely 'The LORD shall fight for you, and you shall hold your peace' (Exodus 14:14) and 'The LORD is a man of war, the LORD is His name' (Exodus 15:3), which appear in the surrounding context of the passage being translated. These verses are considered particularly powerful for spiritual protection when carrying the deceased. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 2, Chapter 15 — The reference connects to the broader discussion in Ma'avar Yabok about proper funeral rituals, specifically how certain biblical verses create spiritual protection during the transport of the deceased. The Zohar reference is meant to provide authoritative support for the ritual practice being described.

[iii] The term 'porchot' (flyers) refers to a specific category of harmful spirits in Jewish mystical tradition that are believed to hover around the deceased during transport to burial. According to kabbalistic belief, these entities are drawn to the body during this liminal period and must be actively repelled through proper intention (kavvanah) and recitation of protective verses.

[iv] The number seven has profound significance in Jewish ritual practice, particularly relating to transitions. The seven stops mirror the seven heavens through which the soul must ascend, creating a corresponding earthly ritual to facilitate this spiritual journey. This practice also recalls the seven hakafot (circuits) performed around the deceased before leaving the house, forming a complete ritual framework for the journey from home to grave.

[v] Cf. Zohar — The reference to spirits called "flyers" (porchot) derives from Zoharic conceptions of harmful spiritual entities that can attach themselves to the deceased during transport to burial. The practice described here is intended as spiritual protection for the soul during this vulnerable transition. | Cf. Talmud — The practice of resting the coffin seven times before burial likely derives from the Talmudic teaching about seven stations when leaving a cemetery, here inverted

There is great solace for the soul of the departed through the seven circuits (hakafot),[4] the significance of which is explained in Chapter 17 of Discourse 3 and further in Chapter 30 of Discourse 3935R

[1]The Hebrew 'lo' (לו) meaning 'to him' or 'above him' refers to God in Isaiah's vision. In funeral contexts, this verse creates a parallel between God's throne surrounded by angels and the deceased being surrounded by divine protection.

[2]The number six in Jewish mysticism often represents completeness within the created world (created in six days). In Ma'avar Yabok, the six-winged angels symbolize the complete protection offered to the soul during its transition.

[3]The Hebrew term 'ye'ofef' (יְעוֹפֵף) implies continuous flying or hovering. This connects to the concept of the soul's journey after death, with angels constantly accompanying it between worlds.

[4]The Hebrew term 'hakafot' refers to ritual circumambulations or circuits, usually made in a counterclockwise direction. In this funeral context, they involve carrying or walking around the deceased's body or bier, usually while reciting psalms or prayers. The number seven connects to various Jewish symbolism including the seven days of creation and seven divine attributes.

and applied to the approach to burial. This reversal creates symmetry in the journey to and from the grave.

[i]This refers to Isaiah's vision (Isaiah 6:2) of angelic beings standing above God's throne. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is recited during funeral processions to create a spiritual connection between earthly burial rituals and heavenly realities.

[ii]The repetition of "six wings" emphasizes the complete nature of the angelic beings. In kabbalistic interpretation, these six wings correspond to the six sefirot from Chesed to Yesod, representing different divine attributes that protect the soul during its journey after death.

[iii]The covering of the face symbolizes the angels' reverence before divine glory. In death rituals, this represents how even celestial beings cannot directly gaze upon divine mysteries, teaching humility to mourners.

[iv]The covering of the feet is interpreted in Jewish mystical tradition as concealing the angels' lower nature. In funeral contexts, this represents how the soul's earthly attachments are covered as it transitions to spiritual realms.

[v]The flight of the Seraphim represents spiritual movement and service. In Ma'avar Yabok, this image inspires the visualization of angels escorting the departed soul as it 'flies' to its heavenly destination.

[vi]Cf. Isaiah 6:2 — This verse is quoted during funeral processions in Ma'avar Yabok to invoke divine protection through angelic imagery. In the context of death rituals, it connects the earthly funeral procession with celestial realities, suggesting that just as the Seraphim attend the divine throne, angels attend the soul's journey after death. | Cf. Zohar — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is likely intended to help those attending the funeral visualize the soul being escorted by angelic beings on its journey. The six wings correspond to different divine attributes and protective powers that shield the soul during its transition.

[vii]This refers to the preceding verse (Seraphim standing above...) having special spiritual efficacy or power when recited.

[viii]In this context, 'adam gadol' (distinguished person) specifically means a Torah scholar or spiritually significant individual, for whom these special prayers and practices are considered particularly appropriate.

[ix]The concept that seven circuits (hakafot) around the deceased's body provide 'great comfort' (niycha gedolah) to the departed soul is a kabbalistic idea not found in earlier rabbinic sources. This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's integration of mystical practices into funeral rituals.

In each circuit, he shall recite [the psalm beginning with] "He who dwells in the shelter of the Most High" until "For You, O LORD, are my refuge"[A] (Psalm 91) and each time shall give at least one perutah (small coin) to charity on behalf of the deceased, or set it aside in his pocket for the atonement of his soul.[2] 3945R

I hereby give this coin for charity[B] on behalf of all Israel[3] and for (so-and-so), this departed one, for the 3950R

[A] Or: "During each circuit, he should recite from "He who dwells in the shelter of the Most High" through "For You, LORD, are my refuge"" — This alternate translation makes it clearer that a specific portion of Psalm 91 is being recited, not the entire psalm. It also uses a more contemporary phrasing that might be more accessible to modern readers.

[B] Or: "I am giving this coin as tzedakah" — This alternate translation preserves the Hebrew term 'tzedakah' which carries nuances beyond the English 'charity,' including connotations of justice and righteousness. This might be preferable in contexts where the audience is familiar with Jewish terminology.

[1] This 'great washing' (rechitzah ha-gedolah) refers to the ritual purification of the deceased (tahara). By attributing it to Hillel the Elder, a renowned sage from the first century BCE, the text seeks to establish historical legitimacy for practices that were largely developed in medieval kabbalistic circles.

[2] The Hebrew 'kaparat nafsho' reflects the theological concept that charitable giving can serve as atonement (kapparah) for the deceased, helping to cleanse the soul of any remaining spiritual blemishes as it transitions to the afterlife.

[3] Including 'all Israel' in charitable dedications is a common practice that reflects the concept of Jewish collective responsibility and mutual spiritual benefit.

[i] The attribution of the 'great washing ritual' to Hillel the Elder (c. 110 BCE-10 CE) is significant. While Hillel was known for various teachings, this specific attribution of funeral purification practices to him is unique to Ma'avar Yabok and related kabbalistic works, representing an attempt to provide ancient authority to mystical practices.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The text references two specific chapters within Ma'avar Yabok itself that explain the mystical significance of the seven circuits (hakafot) made around the deceased's body. This self-referential citation indicates that the hakafot ritual has been treated in depth elsewhere in the book, showing the interconnected nature of Ma'avar Yabok's structure. | Cf. Hillel the Elder — The text attributes a specific purification ritual (referred to as 'the great washing') to Hillel the Elder, a renowned sage from the late Second Temple period. This attribution connects the funeral practices detailed in Ma'avar Yabok to ancient rabbinic authority, legitimizing them through association with this revered historical figure.

[iii] Cf. Psalm 91 — Psalm 91 ("He who dwells in the shelter of the Most High") is considered in Jewish tradition to have protective powers against harmful spiritual forces, making it particularly appropriate for funeral rituals where the soul is considered vulnerable during its transition to the afterlife. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 2, Chapter 17 — In this earlier section, the author explains the spiritual significance of the seven circuits (hakafot) around the deceased's body and how they comfort the departing soul. This present instruction builds on that explanation by providing the specific ritual details.

[iv] This formula is recited when giving charity (tzedakah) on behalf of the deceased, reflecting the Jewish belief that charitable acts benefit the souls of the departed. A 'perutah' is a small coin, representing the minimum denomination that fulfills the obligation of charity.

In each circuit (hakafah)[2] when the prayer leader steps out from the row, he should recite "Ana Bekoach"[3] etc. I have found it beneficial to also recite the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy.[4] When the prayer leader recites "Vaya'avor" (And He passed), which is when divine mercy is awakened,[5] all the people should respond:

יְהִי רָצוֹן מִלְּפָנֶיךָ יְיָ אֱלֹהֵינוּ

May it be Your will, LORD our God and God of our

[1]The translation preserves the theological concept that charitable acts can provide spiritual benefit and rest for the deceased's soul in the afterlife, a central theme in Ma'avar Yabok.
[2]The term 'hakafah' specifically refers to the ritual circling of the deceased's bier before burial, which is performed seven times according to kabbalistic tradition. These circuits are believed to comfort the soul and provide spiritual protection.
[3]I've kept this prayer name untranslated as it is commonly known by its Hebrew title. The prayer begins with the words 'Ana bekoach gedulat yemincha' (Please, with the strength of Your great right hand).
[4]This refers to the enumeration of God's compassionate qualities listed in Exodus 34:6-7, beginning with 'Adonai, Adonai, El rachum v'chanun' (LORD, LORD, God merciful and gracious).
[5]This reflects the kabbalistic concept that certain prayers at specific moments create openings between the human and divine realms, allowing for greater flow of divine compassion.

[i]The word 'ploni' (פלוני) is a placeholder where the name of the deceased would be inserted. The text instructs the reader to substitute the actual name here.
[ii]This phrase reflects the Jewish belief in Gan Eden (Garden of Eden) as the place where righteous souls find rest after death. The charitable act is understood to facilitate this spiritual rest.
[iii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 21, Second Discourse — This chapter explains that charity (tzedakah) given for the deceased provides atonement for their soul. The text specifically states that giving at least six perutot (small coins) serves as 'ransom for the soul' of the departed, emphasizing the spiritual efficacy of charitable giving in facilitating the soul's journey after death.
[iv]This refers to one of the seven ritual circuits (hakafot) performed around the deceased's bier during funeral rituals, based on the practice described in Ma'avar Yabok.
[v]The prayer leader who guides the funeral proceedings.
[vi]This is an abbreviation for 'Ana Bekoach,' a kabbalistic prayer attributed to the 1st-century sage Rabbi Nehunya ben HaKanah. It contains 42 words that correspond to the 42-letter divine name, and is believed to have special protective powers during spiritual transitions like death.
[vii]This refers to the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (Exodus 34:6-7) which are recited as part of penitential prayers, especially when seeking divine forgiveness and compassion.
[viii]This is the opening word of the biblical passage containing the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (Exodus 34:6). The complete phrase is 'Vaya'avor Adonai al panav vayikra' (And the LORD passed before him and proclaimed).
[ix]This phrase refers to the kabbalistic concept that the recitation of certain prayers at specific moments can 'awaken' or activate divine mercy in the upper worlds.
[x]Cf. Ana Bekoach — Ana Bekoach is a kabbalistic prayer often recited during funeral rituals to provide spiritual protection for the deceased's soul during its transition to the afterlife. | Cf. Thirteen Attributes of Mercy — The Thirteen Attributes (Yud-Gimel Midot) are recited as a powerful supplication for divine mercy and forgiveness. In this funeral context, they're used to request compassion for the deceased during their soul's transition. | Cf. Vaya'avor — The word 'Vaya'avor' (And He passed) begins the recitation of the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy. Kabbalistic tradition holds that this specific moment during prayer creates a special opportunity for divine mercy to be awakened.

וֵאלֹהֵי אֲבוֹתֵינוּ שֶׁתְּרַחֵם עַל (פלוני) זֶה הַנִּפְטָר וְתִמְחוֹל לוֹ כָּל פְּשָׁעָיו וַעֲוֹנוֹתָיו[i] יְיָ יְיָ אֵל רַחוּם וְחַנּוּן[ii]: 3710

They should give the coins to the poor at that time, or if they are not present there, one should search for them within twenty-four hours. [A] Or: "May it be favorable before You, LORD our God and God of our ancestors" — This translation better captures the formal, deferential tone of addressing the divine in traditional Jewish prayers, where God is approached indirectly through the formulaic "milfanecha" (from before You). This would be preferable in a more literal or traditional rendering.

[B] Or: "(name), this deceased person" — While "departed one" has a gentle, euphemistic quality appropriate for liturgical language, "deceased person" might be preferred in contexts requiring more direct language, particularly in academic or descriptive treatments of the ritual.

[1] The prayer follows the theological framework of Ma'avar Yabok that emphasizes the power of confession and atonement even after death, reflecting the book's view that proper spiritual care can continue to benefit the soul in its posthumous journey.

[2] In the Jewish tradition, this prayer is typically recited during funeral rituals or when visiting graves, especially during the first thirty days after death. It reflects the belief that prayers of the living can benefit the deceased by securing divine mercy for their souls.

[i] The text uses two terms for sins: "pesha'av" (transgressions, referring to rebellious sins) and "avonotav" (iniquities, referring to intentional sins). This reflects the comprehensive nature of the prayer seeking complete forgiveness for all categories of sins.

[ii] This is the beginning of the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (Exodus 34:6-7), a liturgical formula frequently recited in prayers for forgiveness. The full formula would continue with "אֶרֶךְ אַפַּיִם וְרַב־חֶסֶד וֶאֱמֶת" (slow to anger, abounding in kindness and truth), but only the opening is quoted here.

[iii] Cf. Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (Exodus 34:6-7) — This prayer borrows directly from the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy, a central text for seeking divine forgiveness. This reference would have signaled to readers that the prayer follows in the tradition of seeking atonement through appeal to God's merciful qualities rather than through human merit. | Cf. Tziduk HaDin prayers — This prayer appears within the larger context of Tziduk HaDin (Justification of the Divine Judgment) prayers recited at funerals, which acknowledge God's righteousness even in the face of death while seeking mercy for the deceased.

[iv] A zecchino was a Venetian gold coin widely used throughout the Mediterranean region during the medieval and early modern periods. Its mention here shows the Italian influence on the author's context.

[v] The term 'adam gadol' (distinguished person) typically refers to a Torah scholar or community leader of high standing, indicating that more elaborate charitable practices were reserved for those of higher social or religious status.

[vi] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage provides specific instructions about the charitable donations made during funeral rituals. The reference to customs in the Land of Israel suggests the author was documenting differing practices between diaspora communities and those in Israel. | Cf. Chevra Kadisha practices — The text references the traditional Jewish burial society practice of giving charity on behalf of the deceased as part of the funeral rites. The specification of twenty-four hours indicates the urgency of fulfilling this obligation. | Cf. Zohar on charity for the dead — The practice of placing coins on the deceased likely derives from the kabbalistic notion that charity has special power to elevate the soul after death, as discussed in the Zohar. The specific mention of gold, silver, and copper may reflect the kabbalistic correspondence between different metals and different sefirot or divine attributes.

[1]The original Hebrew term 'hakafot' refers to ritual circuits or processions, similar to those performed during Simchat Torah or around a wedding couple. In this funeral context, these circuits are performed around the deceased's bier. The '42-letter Name' (Shem Mem-Bet) is a mystical divine name in Kabbalah, typically encoded in the initial letters of the prayer 'Ana Bekoach.' The structure of this ritual, with seven circuits, corresponds to the seven lines of six letters each that comprise this name.

[2]The term 'כַּפָּרָה' (kapparah) carries deeper significance in Jewish thought than simple forgiveness—it represents a complete spiritual cleansing and atonement. In the context of funeral prayers, it refers to the purification of the soul as it transitions to the afterlife.

[3]This prayer appears as part of the hakafot (circuit) ritual where mourners walk around the deceased's bier seven times before burial. Each circuit includes prayers that follow mystical patterns, with this one specifically structured around the first three letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

[4]These divine epithets are arranged in a specific order that progresses from aspects of divine judgment ('Holy') to divine compassion ('Merciful') to divine transcendence ('Most High'), creating a pathway for the soul's ascent through various spiritual realms.

[5]The Hebrew phrase has a double meaning, referring both to the biblical flaming sword guarding Eden and to the spiritual fires of judgment that might impede the soul's journey after death.

[i]This phrase refers to ritual circuits (hakafot) structured according to the mystical 42-letter Name of God (Shem Mem-Bet). In kabbalistic tradition, this name was often divided into seven groups of six letters each, which explains the seven circuits mentioned in the following text. This name was considered especially powerful for protection and spiritual elevation.

[ii]Cf. 42-letter Name of God (Shem Mem-Bet) — This refers to a mystical 42-letter divine name in Kabbalah, commonly used in protective prayers. In Ma'avar Yabok, it appears specifically in deathbed and burial rituals. The seven circuits (hakafot) mentioned here correspond to the seven groups of six letters that make up this 42-letter name. | Cf. Prayer 'Ana Bekoach' — The 42-letter Name is encoded in the first letters of the words in the prayer 'Ana Bekoach,' which appears earlier in Ma'avar Yabok's deathbed ritual. These circuits (hakafot) are structured around this same mystical name. | Cf. Hakafot rituals — The ritual of seven circuits (hakafot) around the bier has special significance in Ma'avar Yabok for comforting the deceased's soul. Each circuit includes recitation of Psalm 91 and charitable giving for the deceased's atonement.

[iii]This prayer uses a literary device where the first three words begin with the Hebrew letters א-ב-ג, forming the beginning of an alphabetical acrostic corresponding to the 42-letter divine name (Shem Mem-Bet).

[iv]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This prayer appears to be part of the hakafot (circuit) prayers performed around the bier during funeral rituals in Ma'avar Yabok. The text follows the pattern of the 42-letter divine name (Shem Mem-Bet) prayers, with triplets of words arranged in acrostic form. This specific section uses the first three letters of the Hebrew alphabet (אבג) to begin each phrase.

[v]This threefold designation of God ('Holy, Merciful, Most High') creates a parallel with the three holy angels mentioned in the first circuit prayer and reflects the Kabbalistic structure of the prayer sequence that progresses through the divine attributes.

[vi]This phrase alludes to the flaming sword that guarded Eden after Adam and Eve's expulsion (Genesis 3:24). In Kabbalistic thought, this represents the negative spiritual forces that might impede the soul's journey after death.

בְּרַחֲמֵי טָהוֹר רַחֲמֵהוּ.[vii] צְדָקָה

With the compassion of the Pure One,[5] have mercy

[1]The possessive form 'Your Garden of Eden' (rather than simply 'Garden of Eden') emphasizes the personal relationship between God and the afterlife realm, reflecting the Kabbalistic concept that divine presence permeates and sustains the heavenly paradise.

[2]The opening phrase 'נָא גָּדוֹל דָּגוּל' continues an acrostic pattern based on the 42-letter Divine Name, with both divine epithets beginning with the same Hebrew letter (gimmel).

[3]This imagery evokes the divine protection described in biblical texts, where God's presence is manifested as both brightness (representing revelation and glory) and cloud (representing mystery and shelter).

[4]According to kabbalistic understanding in Ma'avar Yabok, the soul's proper journey after death is upward through spiritual realms. This prayer seeks to ensure the deceased's soul continues its ascent without being pulled downward by negative forces or past transgressions.

[5]The Hebrew term 'טָהוֹר' (Pure One) is a divine epithet that appears elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok. This prayer employs multiple divine appellations, each emphasizing different aspects of God's nature.

[i]This prayer closes with a parallel structure to the first hakafah prayer, creating a unified form for all seven hakafot prayers. Each hakafah concludes with this same request for divine compassion.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This prayer is part of the seven hakafot (circuits) performed around the deceased's bier before burial. Each circuit includes recitation of Psalm 91, giving charity for the deceased's soul, and reciting a prayer structured around the 42-letter Divine Name. This text is the second of these seven prayer formulas, corresponding to the second circuit. | Cf. Genesis 3:24 — The phrase 'flaming fire of the sword' (לַהַט הַחֶרֶב בְּאֹשׁוֹ) alludes to the 'flaming sword' (לַהַט הַחֶרֶב) that guarded the way to the Garden of Eden after Adam and Eve's expulsion. The prayer asks for the deceased to be allowed entry into Eden, past this fiery barrier.

[iii]This opening address to God uses two adjectives that both begin with the Hebrew letter gimmel, continuing the acrostic pattern of the prayer sequence that corresponds to the 42-letter Divine Name.

[iv]The imagery of 'brightness and cloud of Your canopy' draws on biblical descriptions of divine protection and presence, particularly from Exodus where God appeared in a cloud, and from Psalm 91 which speaks of divine shelter.

[v]This phrase reflects the kabbalistic understanding of death as an ascent through spiritual realms. The emphasis on ascending without descending expresses the hope that the soul will not be pulled downward by negative spiritual forces.

[vi]Cf. Psalm 91 — This prayer echoes the protective imagery of Psalm 91, where God provides shelter and refuge to those who trust in Him. It adapts these themes to the context of a soul's journey after death. | Cf. Shem Mem-Bet — This prayer is the third in a sequence of seven prayers that correspond to the 42-letter Divine Name (Shem Mem-Bet). Each prayer follows a similar structure and is recited during one of the seven circuits (hakafot) performed around the deceased's bier before burial. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 15, Third Discourse — The phrase 'may he ascend and not descend' alludes to the kabbalistic teaching that the soul should only ascend through spiritual realms after death, and not be pulled downward by negative forces. This is a central concept in Ma'avar Yabok's mystical understanding of death.

[vii]This opening phrase invokes divine compassion using the divine attribute 'Pure One' (טָהוֹר). The repetition of the root רחם (mercy/compassion) creates emphasis through wordplay.

[A] Or: "May the Living, Holy, Blessed One purify his exalted soul" — The Hebrew 'עֶלְיוֹן' could modify either the divine subject ('the Most High') or the object ('his exalted soul'). This alternative reading takes it as describing the quality of the soul rather than the location of purification.

[B] Or: "And may the gates of the Sanctuary and the divine chamber be opened willingly for him" — This alternative translation emphasizes the metaphorical nature of these heavenly spaces and the concept that they actively welcome the worthy soul rather than merely being accessible to it.

[1] The phrase 'צְדָקָה תָּמִיד גְּמָלֵהוּ' could alternatively be translated as 'Always bestow charity upon him,' as the term צדקה has the dual meaning of righteousness and charitable giving. In this context, it likely refers to divine benevolence toward the deceased.

[2] The phrase 'שׁוֹכֵן שָׁמַיִם' (literally 'Dweller of Heaven') is a circumlocution for God, reflecting the Jewish practice of using indirect references to the divine, particularly in liturgical contexts.

[3] The Hebrew uses two synonyms for joy (simcha and sasson) which appear together in biblical passages describing redemption. This repetition creates emphasis and conveys the complete and perfect nature of the joy experienced in the afterlife.

[i] In Jewish angelology, Michael serves as Israel's guardian and advocate before God. Here, his role is as psychopomp—guiding the soul through the heavenly realms to divine judgment.

[ii] The theme of divine atonement (כפרה) for the deceased's guilt (אשמתו) reflects the Jewish belief that death itself serves as atonement, especially when accompanied by proper rituals.

[iii] Cf. Psalm 36:8-9 — The phrase 'from the river of Your delights' (מִנַּחַל עֲדָנֶיךָ) directly references Psalm 36:8-9, which describes divine abundance. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this refers to the soul's spiritual sustenance in the afterlife. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This prayer is the fourth in a sequence of seven prayers recited during the hakafot (circuits) around the bier before burial. Each prayer follows the same structure, concluding with 'May He send atonement for his guilt and bestow His mercies upon him.' The seven prayers correspond to the seven letters of the 42-letter Divine Name. | Cf. Zohar — The mention of Michael bringing the soul before the 'Dweller of Heaven' reflects the Zoharic concept that Michael serves as the High Priest in the celestial Temple and as the advocate for souls in the heavenly court, particularly for the people of Israel.

[iv] This opening phrase contains three divine epithets: 'Living,' 'Holy,' and 'Blessed,' which together represent aspects of God's nature relevant to the soul's transition after death.

[v] The 'Temple' and 'pavilion' are metaphors for different heavenly reception areas for the soul. The Temple (Beit Mikdash) represents the cosmic counterpart to the earthly Temple, while the appiryon (from Song of Songs 3:9) represents the royal canopy or palanquin prepared for honored souls.

[vi] In Jewish angelology, Michael is often depicted as the angelic usher who escorts righteous souls into paradise. This reflects the tradition that each person has a specific angelic guide for the afterlife journey.

[vii] Cf. Psalm 51:4 — The prayer draws on the biblical concept of divine purification of the soul, similar to David's plea in Psalm 51 | Cf. Song of Songs 3:9 — The text uses this biblical image of the royal pavilion (appiryon) as a metaphor for the celestial reception area for the soul of the

He who dwells from ancient times,[C] whose righteousness and uprightness are Your perfections,[D] may He be a supporter and upholder for this soul.[2] May it serve before You in the celestial plains,[E] and never depart day or night. May He send atonement

[A] Or: "O Yah, reveal to Your pure and holy son Your redemption." — This alternate reading takes 'זַךְ קָדוֹשׁ' (pure and holy) as modifying 'בֵּן' (son) rather than serving as epithets for God. This interpretation would emphasize the deceased's spiritual purity and sanctity as qualities making them worthy of divine redemption.

[B] Or: "And upon the holy altar, may his soul be presented" — The term 'נְצֶבֶת' can also carry connotations of 'being presented' or 'offered up,' which would strengthen the sacrificial metaphor. This reading would emphasize the soul as an offering being presented to God rather than simply standing in the divine presence.

[C] Or: "Dweller of antiquity and eternity" — This alternate translation emphasizes the eternal nature of God with more poetic language that might better capture the metaphysical sense of the original Hebrew.

[D] Or: "Your righteousness, uprightness, and integrity" — This alternate translation is more direct and treats the three nouns as parallel attributes rather than describing them as 'perfections,' which is implied but not explicit in the original.

[E] Or: "And in Aravot [the highest heaven] may it minister before You" — This alternate translation preserves the specific kabbalistic term 'Aravot,' which refers to the seventh and highest heaven in Jewish mystical cosmology, rather than translating it generically as 'celestial plains.'

[1] The formula 'וְיִשְׁלַח כַּפָּרָה לְאַשְׁמָתוֹ וְיִתֵּן אֵלָיו רַחֲמָיו' appears at the end of each of the seven hakafot prayers in Ma'avar Yabok, serving as a standardized closing petition for divine mercy and forgiveness for the deceased.

[2] The Hebrew uses two complementary terms (מַחֲזִיק וְתוֹמֵךְ) that together convey both active strengthening and supportive upholding, reflecting the comprehensive divine care hoped for the departed soul.

deceased | Cf. Book of Daniel, Chapter 12 — The reference to Michael reflects the Jewish tradition of Michael as the guardian angel of Israel who escorts worthy souls to their heavenly abode | Cf. Isaiah 35:10 — The paired terms 'happiness and gladness' echo Isaiah's description of redemption, suggesting the soul's heavenly reception is like the redemptive return to Zion

[i] Cf. Psalm 111:9 — The opening invocation echoes the psalmist's language about God sending redemption, reframing it as a direct plea in the context of a soul's transition after death | Cf. Exodus 40:29 — The prayer metaphorically presents the deceased's soul as an offering on the divine altar, transforming the physical death into a sacred sacrifice | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Sixth Hakafah Prayer — Each of these seven hakafot prayers follows a similar structure, invoking divine attributes associated with letters of the 42-letter Name while seeking mercy for the departed soul's journey

[ii] The term 'Aravot' (עֲרֻבוֹת) refers specifically to the seventh and highest heaven in Jewish mystical tradition, where God's throne is located. This is not merely a poetic reference to heavenly regions but a precise cosmological location in kabbalistic thought.

[iii] This phrase echoes Joshua 1:8 regarding constant meditation on Torah, but here applies to the soul's continuous service in the divine presence, suggesting an eternal state of devotion unbounded by time.

[iv] The concept of 'sending atonement' (כַּפָּרָה) for the soul reflects the Jewish belief that certain spiritual processes continue after death, and that divine mercy can still affect the soul's status in the afterlife.

[v] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This is the seventh and final prayer of the hakafot ritual. These prayers for his soul and extend His mercies to him.

ואחר שהשלים ההקפות יאמר[i][ii] And after completing the circuits (hakafot), he shall say:[1]

3760 וְלִבְנֵי הַפִּילַגְשִׁים[iii] אֲשֶׁר לְאַבְרָהָם נָתַן אַבְרָהָם מַתָּנֹת:[iv][v] And to the sons of the concubines[2] who belonged to Abraham, Abraham gave gifts:[3] 4015R

[1]The hakafot ritual described here is part of the Jewish funeral ceremony. Seven ceremonial circuits are performed around the bier of the deceased before burial, each accompanied by recitation of Psalm 91, an act of charity, and prayers structured around the 42-letter Divine Name. The text that follows this instruction contains biblical verses that are to be recited at the conclusion of these circuits.

[2]The Hebrew term "pilagshim" (פִּילַגְשִׁים) refers to women who had a recognized relationship with Abraham that was secondary to his primary wife. While 'concubines' carries potentially negative connotations in English, in biblical context these were legitimate relationships with legal standing, though of lesser status than a full wife.

[3]In the funeral context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse creates a parallel between Abraham's gifts follow a kabbalistic pattern structured around the 42-letter Divine Name, where each prayer represents a different spiritual aspect of the deceased's journey. The seventh prayer specifically focuses on the soul's continuous service in the highest heaven (Aravot), suggesting the completion of its transition. | Cf. Psalm 91 — The opening phrase 'שׁוֹכֵן קֶדֶם' (Dweller of antiquity) echoes the opening of Psalm 91, which is specifically recommended in Ma'avar Yabok to be recited during these funeral circuits. This creates a textual link between this prayer and the psalm that precedes it in the ritual. | Cf. Zohar — The reference to the soul serving in 'Aravot' draws on kabbalistic teachings about the afterlife, suggesting the deceased's soul has reached the highest level of spiritual existence. This is particularly significant as the concluding prayer of the seven hakafot, symbolizing the complete elevation of the soul.

[i]This instructional line appears after the description of the seven hakafot (ceremonial circuits) around the deceased's bier. These seven hakafot correspond to the structure of the 42-letter Divine Name and represent the soul's progressive elevation through spiritual realms.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, section on funeral rituals — The 'hakafot' (circuits) referred to here are the seven ceremonial encirclements of the deceased's bier before burial. Each circuit includes the recitation of Psalm 91, charitable giving, and a prayer structured around the 42-letter Divine Name. This ritual is believed to provide protection for the soul during its transition to the afterlife. | Cf. Genesis 25:6 — The verse that follows ('To the sons of the concubines that Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts...') is quoted in this context because it provides a biblical basis for the practice of giving charity as part of funeral rites. Just as Abraham gave gifts to separate his concubines' sons, the charitable gifts during hakafot serve to appease spiritual accusers. | Cf. Psalm 78:38 — The verse 'But He, being compassionate, forgave iniquity and did not destroy; many times He turned away His anger, and did not stir up all His wrath' is recited here as a prayer for divine mercy upon the deceased. This verse is traditionally recited three times as part of the Tachanun (supplication) prayers and is believed to have protective properties against spiritual accusers.

[iii]This is a direct quotation from Genesis 25:6, part of the passage describing Abraham's final arrangements before his death. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse appears at the conclusion of the hakafot ritual performed around the deceased's bier, creating a connection between Abraham's gifts to his concubines' sons (whom he sent away) and the charitable gifts distributed during the funeral ritual.

[iv]The verse is deliberately truncated here, omitting the remainder of the biblical passage which states that Abraham "sent them away from his son Isaac eastward, to the land of the east." In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's funeral ritual, this verse likely symbolizes the spiritual gifts or merits transferred to the deceased through charitable donations made on their behalf.

[v]Cf. Genesis 25:6 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse appears at the conclusion of the hakafot (circuit) ritual around the deceased's bier. The author intentionally uses this verse to create a theological parallel between Abraham's gifts and the charitable donations made during funeral rituals. Just as Abraham provided for his sons before sending them away, the community provides spiritual 'gifts' (charity) to accompany the deceased soul on its journey. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok hakafot ritual — This verse connects to the book's repeated emphasis on charity (tzedakah) as spiritual to his sons and the charitable donations (gifts) made during the funeral ritual for the spiritual benefit of the deceased. The charitable donations function as 'gifts' that accompany the soul on its journey, just as Abraham gave gifts to his sons before sending them away.

[1]The Hebrew 'v'hu rachum' establishes God's essential nature as merciful before describing His actions. This emphasizes that mercy is not merely something God does but reflects who God is fundamentally.

[2]The Hebrew 'yekhaper avon' uses terminology associated with ritual atonement and purification, connecting this verse to Temple sacrifice concepts. In Ma'avar Yabok's context, this suggests that death itself can serve as atonement when approached with proper spiritual intention.

[3]The Hebrew construction 'v'hirbah l'hashiv apo' literally means 'He has abundantly turned away His anger,' emphasizing not just that God turns away anger occasionally, but does so repeatedly and abundantly. This reinforces the theological premise of God's consistent mercy even in the face of human failings.

[4]I've translated 'hakafot' (הקפות) as 'circuits' while also keeping the Hebrew term in parentheses for clarity. These ritual circumambulations have deep significance in Jewish mystical practice, not just for funerals but also in other contexts such as Simchat Torah and Sukkot.

[5]I've kept the transliteration of 'Tziduk HaDin' rather than translating it fully as 'Justification of the Judgment' because it is a specific ritual prayer with this technical name in Jewish tradition.

[6]The Hebrew literally says 'at his home' (בביתו), which in context clearly refers to the home of the protection for the deceased. The charitable gifts made during the funeral ritual are understood as accompanying the soul on its journey after death, just as Abraham's gifts accompanied his sons when they departed. The verse appears specifically after the hakafot ritual where donations are made with each circuit around the bier.

[i]This verse begins with 'And He, being merciful,' establishing God's compassionate nature as the foundation for the divine actions that follow. In kabbalistic thought, this refers to God's attribute of mercy (rachamim), which moderates the attribute of judgment (din).

[ii]The Hebrew phrase 'and does not destroy' carries particular significance in the context of death rituals, as it implicitly acknowledges God's power to destroy while emphasizing His restraint, offering comfort to those facing mortality.

[iii]The image of God 'not arousing all His wrath' draws on ancient Near Eastern royal imagery, where a king's full wrath would mean total destruction. The text suggests that even in judgment, God exercises merciful restraint—a crucial theological point when contemplating divine judgment at death.

[iv]Cf. Psalm 78:38 — This verse is quoted directly from Psalm 78:38 and appears frequently in Jewish liturgy, especially in penitential contexts. In Ma'avar Yabok, it serves as a prayer for divine mercy at the moment of death, particularly when recited three times by those attending the dying person. The verse emphasizes God's compassionate nature even in the face of human sin, making it especially appropriate as a plea for mercy during the soul's transition. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok funeral ritual instructions — The text specifically instructs that this verse should be recited three times by each person throwing earth into the grave. According to Ma'avar Yabok, this practice helps weaken 'the heads of the destroyer' (רָאשֵׁי הַמַּשְׁחִית) and alleviates the suffering of 'chibut ha-kever' (beating in the grave) for the deceased. This contextualizes the verse not merely as a general prayer for mercy but as having specific protective power against negative spiritual forces during burial.

[v]The term 'hakafot' (circuits) refers to a ritual of walking in circles around the bier of the deceased. This practice is based on kabbalistic principles and is believed to have protective properties for the soul's journey after death.

[vi]Tziduk HaDin (Justification of the Judgment) is a prayer recited at funerals that acknowledges the righteousness of divine judgment, even in death. It begins with the verse 'The Rock, His work is perfect, for all His ways are justice' (Deut. 32:4).

שישאוהו הכתפים:[i] [ii]

In Chapter 21 of Discourse 2,[1] the mystical significance of Tziduk HaDin[2] (Justification of the Divine Judgment) will be explained. Many of its laws are also found in Chapter 26 of Discourse 5. The order of Tziduk HaDin that the mourner should recite[3] is: 4025R deceased, not the home of the person performing the ritual.

[1] I've translated 'מאמר' as 'Discourse' rather than simply 'section' to preserve the specific structural terminology used in Ma'avar Yabok. This book is organized into major discourses (מאמרים) which are further divided into chapters (פרקים).

[2] I've translated 'סוד' as 'mystical significance' rather than literally as 'secret,' which better conveys the kabbalistic connotation in this context. In Jewish mystical literature, 'sod' typically refers to the deepest, esoteric level of interpretation.

[3] The phrase 'שיאמר האבל' specifically indicates that what follows would be the text of the Tziduk HaDin prayer to be recited by the mourner, though the prayer text itself is not included in this excerpt.

[4] This line expresses the theological concept of 'tzidduk hadin' (justification of the divine judgment),

[i] The word 'katapayyim' (literally 'shoulders') refers specifically to the pallbearers who carry the deceased on their shoulders, reflecting the traditional Jewish practice of shoulder-bearing the deceased rather than using a wheeled conveyance.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 17, Discourse 3 — The text refers to an earlier section (Ch. 17) that explains how these seven circuits provide comfort to the deceased's soul and have kabbalistic significance for its journey. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 30, Discourse 5 — This reference provides additional mystical interpretations for the hakafot ritual, particularly how they correspond to the seven lower sefirot and provide protection for the soul's journey. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 21, Discourse 2 — This reference explains the mystical significance of the Tziduk HaDin prayer that is mentioned as preceding the hakafot ritual in the cemetery.

[iii] Tziduk HaDin (literally 'Justification of the Divine Judgment') refers to a prayer recited at Jewish funerals where mourners affirm the righteousness of God's judgment even in death. The term 'סוד' (sod) here indicates that the text will explain not just the practical procedure but the mystical or kabbalistic significance of this ritual.

[iv] The text refers to different sections of Ma'avar Yabok itself, indicating that the book has a complex structure with multiple 'discourses' (מאמרים) divided into chapters. This self-referential organization is typical of comprehensive reference works of the period.

[v] This specifies that the Tziduk HaDin prayer should be recited specifically by the mourner (אבל), who would typically be a close relative of the deceased. This reflects the Jewish practice of assigning specific ritual roles to different participants in the funeral process.

[vi] Cf. Tziduk HaDin — The text references specific chapters within Ma'avar Yabok where the mystical significance and proper procedures for reciting this funeral prayer are detailed. This cross-reference indicates the text's systematic organization, with different aspects of death rituals being treated in specific, cross-referenced sections. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's internal chapter structure — The text contains internal cross-references to other sections of the book, demonstrating how Ma'avar Yabok was designed as a comprehensive reference work with interconnected sections. This shows that the author intended readers to move between different sections to gain complete understanding of specific rituals.

[vii] This line marks the beginning of the Tzidduk HaDin (Justification of Divine Judgment) prayer recited during Jewish funeral services. The phrase comes from Nehemiah 9:33 and is used to acknowledge God's righteousness even in moments of suffering and loss. In Ma'avar Yabok, this prayer is specifically mentioned as part of the burial ritual, to be recited at the graveside after the seven hakafot (circuits) around the bier have been completed.

[viii] Cf. Nehemiah 9:33 — The original biblical source for this phrase, where the people of Israel acknowledge God's justice even during their suffering. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse becomes the

יְהִי רָצוֹן מִלְּפָנֶיךָ יְיָ אֱלֹהֵינוּ וֵאלֹהֵי אֲבוֹתֵינוּ שֶׁתְּגַדֵּר פִּרְצוֹתֵינוּ וּפִרְצוֹת עַמְּךָ יִשְׂרָאֵל בְּרַחֲמִים: עיין בפרק ל״ג מאמר ה׳[i][ii]

After the Tzidduk HaDin (Justification of Divine Judgment) and the Hakafot (ritual circuits), when they carry the coffin on their arms to place it in the grave, they should recite Shir Shel Pegaim (Song of Afflictions, Psalm 91)[3] and "Vihi Noam" (May the pleasantness [of the Lord]). And each person, when throwing earth into the grave, should recite three times "Ve-Hu Rachum"[4] (And He, being merciful), etc. This is a great kindness that weakens the "heads of the destroyer" mentioned in the verse. 4035R 4040R a fundamental Jewish response to death. By affirming God's righteousness even in the face of loss, the mourner acknowledges divine justice while still experiencing grief. The prayer creates a ritual framework for accepting mortality within a religious context, allowing mourners to express their pain while maintaining faith in divine wisdom.

[1]The metaphor of 'breaches' (פרצות) has multiple layers in Jewish thought. Physically, it refers to broken walls that leave a city vulnerable to attack. Spiritually, it represents moral or religious failures that leave individuals or communities vulnerable to spiritual harm. In the context of funeral prayers, it specifically refers to the wound or vulnerability created by death in the fabric of the community.

[2]The prayer follows the Tziduk HaDin (Justification of Divine Judgment), which acknowledges God's justice even in death. This prayer then pivots to request mercy, reflecting the Jewish theological balance between divine justice and compassion.

[3]Psalm 91 was known in rabbinic tradition as 'Shir Shel Pega'im' (Song of Afflictions or Song against Demons) because it was believed to have special protective properties against harmful spiritual forces.

[4]This refers to Psalm 78:38, which begins 'But He, being compassionate, forgave their iniquity and did not destroy them.' This verse was considered particularly powerful for spiritual protection.

The prayer appears here in the practical section as part of the actual burial ritual. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 26, Discourse 5 — As mentioned in memory note 838, Ma'avar Yabok discusses the specific laws of Tzidduk HaDin in Chapter 26 of Discourse 5, showing the book's integration of mystical concepts with practical legal guidance.

[i]The text includes a self-reference to Chapter 33 of Discourse 5, which appears to elaborate on the theological significance of this prayer. This cross-referencing system is typical of Ma'avar Yabok, which functions both as a practical ritual guide and a theoretical explanation of the cosmic significance of these rituals.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 33 of Discourse 5 — The prayer references this chapter for deeper explanation of how mourning rituals create spiritual protection for both the deceased and the community. The phrase 'repair our breaches' refers to the spiritual vulnerability created by death, which the author believes can affect the entire community unless properly addressed through ritual.

[iii]The Hebrew phrase emphasizes that the coffin should be carried by hand rather than using carts or other mechanical means, following traditional Jewish burial practices that honor the deceased through personal effort.

[iv]This phrase refers to destructive spiritual forces believed to have authority over the deceased. The recitation of 'Ve-Hu Rachum' is understood to neutralize these forces through divine mercy.

[1] The text emphasizes communal participation in this ritual, suggesting that the collective spiritual power of the community provides greater protection for the deceased.

[2] The Hebrew והרבה להשיב אפו literally means 'He abundantly turns back His anger,' suggesting God's repeated and generous restraint rather than a one-time action.

[3] The term צחצחות (tzachtzachot) specifically refers to extremely dry, parched places, creating a stark contrast with the following imagery of a well-watered garden. In mystical contexts, this can represent spiritual drought transformed into abundance.

[4] The Hebrew text uses three parallel phrases to describe peaceful afterlife abodes, creating a poetic triplet that emphasizes divine protection and serenity.

[i] This term (literally 'the Beating of the Grave') refers to a concept in Jewish mysticism where the soul undergoes a purification process after burial. The recitation of protective verses is believed to mitigate this suffering.

[ii] Cf. Psalm 91 — This psalm is considered to have special protective properties against harmful spiritual forces and is specifically recommended for recitation during funeral rituals to safeguard the deceased's soul. | Cf. Vihi Noam (Psalm 90:17) — This prayer, beginning with 'May the pleasantness of the Lord our God be upon us,' is recited at transitional moments and is believed to provide spiritual protection. | Cf. Ve-Hu Rachum (Psalm 78:38) — This verse 'And He, being merciful, forgives iniquity and does not destroy; He frequently turns His anger away and does not arouse all His wrath' is believed to have protective power when recited three times while throwing earth into the grave. | Cf. Chibut HaKever — This refers to a Jewish mystical concept of a painful process that occurs after burial where the soul is judged. These ritual recitations are believed to mitigate this suffering for the deceased. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This reference directs readers to Chapter 18 of Discourse 3, which presumably contains more detailed explanations about the spiritual significance of these burial practices.

[iii] This verse from Isaiah uses imagery of a well-watered garden to represent spiritual renewal and divine care. In the context of burial rituals, it suggests hope for the soul's refreshment after death.

[iv] The metaphor of God's name as a protective fortress (migdal oz) is particularly meaningful in burial contexts, suggesting the deceased's soul can find refuge in divine protection during its journey.

[v] This verse's threefold description of peaceful habitation (naveh shalom), secure dwellings (mishkenot mivtachim), and quiet resting places (menuchot sha'ananot) creates a powerful image of the soul's peaceful repose after death.

[A]Or: "May his ingathering be in peace" — The term 'asifah' (gathering) is a euphemism for death in Hebrew, with connotations of being gathered to one's ancestors. This alternative preserves the euphemistic nature while using a slightly different English phrasing.

[B]Or: "corresponding to the highest soul-level (neshamah) within him" — This translation

[1]The final phrase 'אל תרף' (al teref) can be translated as 'do not forsake' or 'do not abandon,' but also carries connotations of 'do not loosen your grip' or 'do not let go,' emphasizing God's continued care and involvement.

[2]The Hebrew "כלם" (kulam) refers to all the people present at the burial, emphasizing the communal nature of this ritual prayer.

[3]The text will proceed to list a series of prayers that should be recited at this specific moment in the burial ritual. This timing is significant as it represents the final transition of the deceased's physical body into its resting place.

[i]Cf. Psalm 78:38 — This verse is traditionally recited three times during burial rituals as indicated by the instruction 'ג' פעמים' (three times). In Ma'avar Yabok, it's specifically recommended when throwing earth into the grave, believed to have protective power against negative spiritual forces. | Cf. Isaiah 58:11 — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse offers hope for the soul's refreshment and strengthening after death, contrasting the 'parched places' of spiritual struggle with the 'watered garden' of divine restoration. | Cf. Psalm 109:31 — In burial contexts, this would be understood as God defending the deceased's soul against spiritual accusers during its judgment, providing divine advocacy during this vulnerable transition. | Cf. Proverbs 18:10 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this imagery of divine protection would be particularly meaningful for the deceased's soul, suggesting it can find refuge in God's name during its journey. | Cf. Isaiah 32:18 — This verse is especially appropriate in burial contexts as it describes the peaceful rest awaiting the righteous soul, with the 'secure dwellings' and 'quiet resting places' representing the soul's tranquil abode in the afterlife. | Cf. Psalm 90:17 — In the context of burial rituals, this can be understood as a prayer that the deceased's good deeds in life be established and accepted by God, creating lasting merit for their soul. | Cf. Psalm 138:8 — For burial rites, this verse offers reassurance that God's love for the deceased continues beyond death and that He will not abandon them, completing His divine purpose for their soul.

[ii]This passage appears in the section of Ma'avar Yabok dealing with burial rituals, specifically identifying regional variations in funeral practices. The phrase introduces a prayer to be recited collectively by all present after the deceased has been placed in the grave.

[iii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 18, Discourse 3 — This passage connects to earlier discussions in Ma'avar Yabok about proper burial practices. The author presents regional variations in ritual practice, acknowledging that different communities might recite different prayers at the same moment in the burial process. | Cf. Zohar III:70b — The prayers that follow this introduction likely relate to the kabbalistic understanding, found in the Zohar, that specific recitations at the graveside help guide the soul on its journey and provide it with peace.

[iv]The term 'asifah' (gathering) is a euphemism for death in Jewish tradition, based on biblical phrases like 'being gathered to one's people' (Genesis 25:8). This gentle euphemism is typical of Ma'avar Yabok's approach to death as a transition rather than an ending.

[v]This phrase refers to the kabbalistic concept that the human soul has three primary components: nefesh (vital soul), ruach (spirit), and neshamah (higher soul). The prayer addresses specifically the neshamah, which is the highest and most divine aspect that returns directly to God after death.

[vi]Cf. Genesis 25:8 — The prayer deliberately echoes the biblical language used for the peaceful

	נגד בחינת הנשמה שבו[iii] ii יְהִי רְבִיצַת שָׁלוֹם[i] רִבִיצָתוֹ:	May his resting place be a peaceful rest:[A] corresponding to the aspect of the neshamah within him[1]
3815	נגד הרוח[vi] v מְחִיצַת שָׁלוֹם תְּהֵא מְחִיצָתוֹ:	"May his partition be a partition of peace"[2]—corresponding to the ruach (spirit)

explicitly identifies the neshamah as the highest of the three primary soul levels in Jewish mysticism, providing important context that might not be clear to readers unfamiliar with Kabbalistic terminology.

[A]Or: "His place of repose shall be a peaceful resting" — This alternate translation emphasizes the noun form 'place of repose' rather than using 'resting place' and slightly varies the wording while maintaining the meaning. This might be preferable in contexts where a more formal or poetic tone is desired.

[1]According to the kabbalistic framework in Ma'avar Yabok, each component of the soul requires its own form of rest after death. This particular prayer focuses on the neshamah (highest soul aspect), requesting appropriate peaceful rest for this spiritual element. Other prayers in this sequence would address the nefesh (vital soul) and ruach (spirit) components.

[2]The term 'mechitzah' (מְחִיצָה) literally means 'partition' or 'divider,' but in this context refers to the soul's spiritual compartment or dwelling place in the afterlife. Each level of the soul (nefesh, ruach, neshamah) is understood to have its own 'mechitzah' or spiritual domain.

death of the patriarchs. The term 'gathering' (asifah) in the Bible is specifically used for the righteous who die peacefully and are 'gathered' to their ancestors. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 3 — This line refers to the kabbalistic concept that the human soul has three primary components: nefesh (vital soul), ruach (spirit), and neshamah (higher soul). The prayer specifically addresses the neshamah, which is the highest and most divine aspect of the soul that returns directly to God after death.

[i]The term 'revitzat' (רְבִיצַת) comes from the root רבץ (r-b-tz) meaning to lie down or rest. In this context, it refers to a spiritual resting place.

[ii]This phrase refers to the neshamah level of the soul, which is the highest of the three primary soul components (nefesh, ruach, neshamah) in Kabbalistic thought. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's burial prayers, this specifically indicates that this particular prayer addresses the highest aspect of the deceased's soul.

[iii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok root.2.1.0.2.115 — This reference provides context about the 'gathering of peace' concept that appears just before this passage. Together they form a sequence of short prayers addressing different aspects of the soul's peaceful transition after death. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok root.2.1.0.2.117 — This reference provides the next prayer in this sequence, continuing the pattern of addressing different aspects of the soul's peaceful transition after death. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok root.4 — This reference explains the theological framework behind this prayer's specific focus on the neshamah aspect of the soul, as part of a comprehensive system addressing each soul component's unique journey after death.

[iv]This is part of a series of blessings recited at a Jewish burial, specifically after placing the body in the grave. Each blessing refers to a different aspect of the soul's resting place, with this one addressing the ruach (middle level of the soul).

[v]This explanatory note indicates that this particular blessing corresponds to the ruach (spirit), which in Kabbalah is the middle level of the three-part soul (nefesh, ruach, neshamah). The preceding blessing addressed the neshamah (highest soul level) and the following one will address the nefesh (vital soul).

[vi]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, earlier sections on soul structure — Throughout Ma'avar Yabok, Aaron Berechia consistently presents the soul as having three primary components: nefesh (vital soul), ruach (spirit), and neshamah (highest divine soul). This passage is part of a ritual formula that addresses each level separately, providing each with its own blessing for peaceful repose in the afterlife. | Cf. Zohar — This threefold blessing structure reflects the Zoharic concept of the soul's tripartite nature, where each component (nefesh, ruach, neshamah) has its own spiritual trajectory and afterlife experience. The Zohar teaches that these soul parts separate at death but remain connected, each dwelling in an appropriate spiritual realm according to its nature.

[A] Or: "May his rest be a peaceful rest" — This alternate translation conveys the same meaning with more natural English phrasing, though it loses some of the repetition present in the original Hebrew which emphasizes the state of 'lying down.'

[B] Or: "For the benefit of the nefesh [vital soul]" — The Hebrew 'neged' can sometimes indicate 'for the benefit of' rather than simply 'corresponding to,' suggesting that this prayer is intended to benefit or protect the nefesh specifically.

[1] The Hebrew uses a threefold repetition of the word 'הִנֵּה' (behold/here is) followed by three different terms for places of residence, creating a poetic progression from a formal structure (מָכוֹן/dwelling place) to a temporary lodging (מָלוֹן) to a final place of rest (מְנוּחָה). This liturgical formula appears to be part of the burial service, acknowledging the grave as the body's final resting place.

[2] The Hebrew 'נגד הגוף וכחותיו' is a brief explanatory note that follows this poetic declaration. It indicates that these three dwelling terms specifically relate to the physical body and its faculties, distinguishing this from other parts of the burial liturgy that might address the soul. In Jewish mystical thought, the body retains significance even after death, as it awaits resurrection.

[3] The term 'הבלא דגרמי' appears frequently in kabbalistic texts to describe a subtle spiritual vapor or essence that remains with the bones after death. This is not ordinary breath but a residual spiritual connection.

[i] The Hebrew indicates that this blessing is specifically directed toward the nefesh (vital soul), which in kabbalistic thought is the lowest of the three soul components. Unlike the higher soul aspects (ruach and neshamah), the nefesh remains more closely connected to the physical body after death and requires specific comfort and protection.

[ii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, earlier passages on the three-part soul — This line is part of a sequence of blessings corresponding to each level of the soul. The preceding lines likely address the higher soul components (neshamah and ruach), while this line specifically addresses the nefesh, which is considered the lowest component that remains closest to the body after death. | Cf. Biblical usage of 'shechivah' (lying down) as euphemism for death — The text deliberately employs this traditional euphemism while transforming it into a positive blessing by adding 'of peace' (shalom). This reflects Ma'avar Yabok's consistent approach of reframing death as a peaceful transition rather than something fearful.

[iii] This threefold declaration appears to be part of a burial ritual in Ma'avar Yabok, likely recited after placing the deceased in the grave. The three terms (מָכוֹן/dwelling place, מָלוֹן/lodging, and מְנוּחָה/resting place) represent a poetic progression from temporary abode to final rest.

[iv] This phrase explains that the preceding three terms correspond to the physical body and its faculties/powers. In kabbalistic thought, the body continues to have significance even after death, particularly as the vessel that will be resurrected in the messianic era.

[v] Cf. Ecclesiastes 12:5 — The threefold formula in Ma'avar Yabok echoes Ecclesiastes' concept of the grave as the 'eternal home' of the body, but with a more positive framing as a place of rest rather than mere finality. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage appears to be part of a larger ritual framework in Ma'avar Yabok that systematically addresses different aspects of the human being (body, nefesh, ruach, and neshamah) at burial, with parallel formulaic declarations for each component.

[vi] This Aramaic phrase literally means "breath/vapor of the bones" and refers to a subtle spiritual essence that remains with the physical remains. In kabbalistic thought, this is one of the aspects of the body that retains a connection to the departed soul.

[1]The poetic phrase 'עצבונא דבישרא' personifies the decomposing flesh as experiencing sorrow or pain, reflecting the Jewish theological view that decomposition is part of the atonement process for the body.

[2]This refers to the luz bone that, according to Jewish tradition, cannot be destroyed and serves as the seed from which the body will be reconstituted at resurrection. The use of the term 'rest' (מנוחה) is significant, suggesting that this bone is in a state of peaceful waiting rather than total death.

[3]The Hebrew phrase 'כָּל קְהַל עֲדָתוֹ' contains a redundancy, as both 'kahal' and 'edah' mean 'congregation.' This doubling emphasizes the communal aspect of the prayer and suggests that both the earthly community and the heavenly assembly are united in this declaration.

[4]The Hebrew 'יָנוּחַ עַל קִבּוּרָתוֹ' literally means 'may he rest upon his burial place.' This reflects the Jewish belief that the soul maintains a connection to the body even after death, hovering near the grave for a period before ascending higher. This concept is elaborated in kabbalistic texts like the Zohar.

[5]The phrase 'שָׁלוֹם בּאֲךָ' (peace upon your arrival) echoes the traditional greeting offered to guests in this world, suggesting continuity between earthly hospitality and heavenly reception. The repetition by three different groups of angels indicates the soul's welcome at successive levels of the spiritual realms.

[6]This is a direct quotation from Daniel 12:13, where the angel tells Daniel about his ultimate fate. By applying this verse to the deceased, the prayer assures them that like Daniel, they will rest

[i]This Aramaic phrase literally means "sadness/pain of the flesh" and refers to the decomposition process of the body, poetically described as the flesh experiencing sorrow as it returns to dust.

[ii]This refers to the rabbinic concept of the luz bone (sometimes identified as the coccyx), which was believed to be indestructible and would serve as the seed from which the body would be reconstituted at the time of resurrection. The word מנוח״ה (rest) has the letters of the word נחמ״ה (comfort) rearranged, suggesting that the indestructible bone provides comfort through the promise of future resurrection.

[iii]Cf. Ezekiel 37 — This passage draws on Ezekiel's vision of resurrection, where breath (הבל) enters the dry bones to restore them to life. The text establishes three components involved in the body's fate: the breath/vapor of bones, the decay/sadness of flesh, and the preserved bone (luz) that will serve as the foundation for resurrection. | Cf. Midrash Genesis Rabbah 28:3 — This reference to 'the bone of resurrection' (עצם של התחיה) alludes to the rabbinic concept of the luz bone, described in Genesis Rabbah as an indestructible bone from which the body will be reconstituted at resurrection. This concept is extensively discussed elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok as a physical connection between death and future resurrection.

[iv]The threefold repetition of 'may peace come' has mystical significance. In Kabbalah, tripling a phrase intensifies its spiritual power and connects it to the three levels of the soul (nefesh, ruach, and neshamah). It also recalls the Priestly Blessing (Numbers 6:24-26) which is structured as three blessings.

until the time of resurrection, when they will 'stand up for their portion'—receive their reward in the World to Come.

[1]The 'dew of light' (טַל אוֹרוֹת) is a powerful resurrection metaphor. Just as dew revives wilted plants, this celestial dew is believed to revive the dead. In kabbalah, this dew is associated with the divine attribute of Chesed (loving-kindness) flowing down from higher spiritual realms.

[2]The Hebrew 'כֹּל הַנְּשָׁמָה תְּהַלֵּל יָהּ' makes a wordplay between 'נְשָׁמָה' (soul/breath) and the verb 'תְּהַלֵּל' (praise), suggesting that the very essence of the soul's existence is to praise God. This verse affirms that the soul continues this divine purpose even after death.

[3]This concluding blessing is a standard liturgical formula that appears at the end of sections in Psalms. Its inclusion here connects the individual's death to the larger cosmic purpose of God's glory filling the world, framing personal loss within a universal, redemptive context.

[i]The phrase 'לְקֵץ הַיָּמִין' (at the end of days/right end) has eschatological significance, referring to the messianic era and resurrection of the dead. The term 'ימין' (right) has positive connotations in Jewish thought, representing the side of mercy and reward, as opposed to 'שמאל' (left), which is associated with judgment.

[ii]The 'dew of lights' (טַל אוֹרוֹת) is interpreted in rabbinic tradition as the 'dew of resurrection' that will revive the dead. The Talmud (Chagigah 12b) associates this celestial dew with the light created on the first day of creation that God stored away for the righteous in the future world.

[iii]The Hebrew word 'רְפָאִים' (refaim) has a dual meaning: it can refer to the departed/shades in the underworld or to healing/physicians. This creates a wordplay suggesting that the earth will 'drop' or 'cast out' those who have died, effectively 'healing' death by releasing its captives during resurrection.

[iv]Cf. Daniel 12:13 — This verse is addressed to the deceased, assuring them that they will arise at the resurrection of the dead. The phrase 'end of days' (קץ הימין) is a messianic reference to the time of redemption. This offers consolation that death is not final. | Cf. Isaiah 25:8 — This prophetic verse reinforces the Jewish belief in resurrection and the end of death. Its inclusion in a burial prayer provides comfort by pointing to a future time when death will be permanently overcome. | Cf. Isaiah 26:19 — This verse describes resurrection through the metaphor of dew, which in rabbinic thought is connected to the 'dew of resurrection' (טל תחיה) that will revive the dead. The passage offers hope that those buried will eventually rise again. | Cf. Psalm 78:38 — This verse is recited to invoke divine mercy for the deceased. In this context, it serves as a plea that God will forgive any sins of the departed and treat them with compassion rather than judgment. | Cf. Psalm 150:6 — This verse connects the soul (נשמה) with praise of God, suggesting that even after death, the soul continues to praise God in the heavenly realm. It affirms the soul's immortality and ongoing spiritual existence. | Cf. Zohar — The tripartite structure of angels greeting the deceased reflects kabbalistic cosmology where the soul encounters different angelic beings as it ascends through heavenly realms. Each set of angels represents a different divine attribute (Chesed/loving-kindness, Rachamim/mercy, and Chen/grace) that will assist the soul's journey after death.

[1]The Hebrew term 'sod' literally means 'secret' but in kabbalistic contexts refers specifically to the deepest, mystical level of interpretation, which is why I've translated it as 'mystical significance.'
[2]I've included the Hebrew term 'kavvanah' in parentheses as it is a technical term in Jewish mysticism referring to the specific spiritual focus and intention that should accompany ritual actions.
[3]In the context of Ma'avar Yabok's post-burial ritual, 'them' refers not to human enemies (as in the original Exodus context) but to harmful spiritual forces that might follow mourners from the cemetery.
[4]This phrase evokes powerful imagery of complete immobilization, suggesting that the hand-washing ritual effectively neutralizes any negative spiritual influences that might have attached themselves to mourners in the cemetery.
[5]The concept of 'crossing over' (ma'avar) is central to the entire book, which uses Jacob's crossing of the Yabok River as a metaphor for the soul's transition between worlds. Here, it refers to the mourners' safe return from the cemetery to normal life.

[i]The specific numbers three and five have mystical significance in Jewish tradition. Three represents balance and stability (connecting to the three Patriarchs), while five connects to the five books of the Torah.
[ii]This refers to the tradition of not passing the burial shovel directly from one person to another, but rather placing it on the ground for the next person to pick up, which is believed to prevent the transmission of death's spiritual impact.
[iii]The word 'sod' (secret/mystery) indicates the mystical dimension of burial practices beyond their practical aspects, suggesting kabbalistic interpretations of these rituals.
[iv]Cf. Chapter 27, Second Discourse of Ma'avar Yabok — The text refers readers to this section for the deeper explanation of these burial customs, suggesting that there are both practical halakhic rules and mystical reasons behind these practices. | Cf. Chapter 19, Third Discourse of Ma'avar Yabok — This cross-reference indicates that proper hand washing after burial requires specific kavvanah (mystical intention), not just physical cleansing, revealing how Ma'avar Yabok integrates practical ritual with mystical significance.
[v]This phrase from Exodus 15:16 (part of the Song at the Sea) is used here to invoke divine protection against harmful spiritual entities that mourners might encounter in or bring back from the cemetery. The 'them' refers metaphorically to these negative spiritual forces.
[vi]The Hebrew 'yidmu ka-aven' (be still as stone) uses the imagery of being rendered motionless like stone, suggesting the complete neutralization of harmful spiritual forces that might follow mourners from the cemetery.
[vii]The verb 'ya'avor' (cross over) connects directly to the title of Ma'avar Yabok (Crossing of the Yabok), reinforcing the book's central metaphor of crossing over safely from one realm to another, in this case from the cemetery (domain of death) back to the world of the living.
[viii]Cf. Exodus 15:16 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is specifically recited during hand-washing after returning from the cemetery. The parallel is significant—just as the Israelites crossed through water to safety while their enemies were rendered powerless, the mourners use water to ritually

[1]The juxtaposition of these two verses creates a powerful ritual framework: the first verse (from Exodus) provides protection during transition, while the second verse (from Leviticus) establishes the purpose of ritual purification—to restore the state of holiness that enables continued relationship with the divine after contact with death.

[2]This type of liturgical instruction appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok and similar ritual manuals, indicating the continuation of a ritual sequence. It signals to the prayer leader or funeral officiant to proceed with additional prayers after completing the previous elements of the service.

[3]This is a common epithet for God in Jewish liturgy, particularly in prayers with mystical overtones. It emphasizes God's sovereignty over multiple spiritual realms, not just the physical world.

[4]This shifts from focusing on the deceased to the community of mourners, a characteristic transition in Jewish memorial prayers that addresses both the spiritual journey of the departed and the continued life of the bereaved.

[5]The conclusion of the prayer expands from the immediate mourners to the entire Jewish people, a common feature in Jewish liturgy that emphasizes communal solidarity even in moments of personal grief.

separate themselves from death and seek protection from harmful spiritual forces associated with the cemetery. | Cf. Leviticus 11:44 — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this verse emphasizes the importance of ritual purification after contact with death. The washing of hands serves as a means of re-establishing holiness and separating oneself from ritual impurity associated with the cemetery. This reflects the book's consistent theme that proper ritual actions have profound spiritual significance, particularly in transitional moments between worlds.

[i]This is a standard liturgical instruction phrase in Ma'avar Yabok that indicates a transition to an additional prayer or text to be recited at a specific point in the funeral ritual.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This is a transitional phrase instructing mourners or the burial society members to continue with additional prayers after completing the previous ritual elements at the graveside. | Cf. Siddur (Jewish prayer book) — This type of liturgical instruction is common in Jewish prayer books to indicate when additional prayers should be recited, particularly in sequential ritual contexts.

[iii]The text contains a rabbinic interpretation explaining that the phrase 'fill his hands,' which normally refers to appointment or ordination, is being interpreted here as referring to the deceased's place in the Garden of Eden. This interpretive note is embedded within the prayer itself.

[iv]Cf. Psalm 21:5-7 — The prayer draws on the royal blessing psalm to express hope for divine blessings in the afterlife for the deceased and continued blessings for the mourners. | Cf. Numbers 6:24-26 — The reference to blessing and the 'light of Your countenance' echoes the language of the Priestly Blessing, suggesting that this prayer invokes similar divine favor both for the deceased and the living. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Fifth Discourse — This prayer follows the pattern established throughout Ma'avar Yabok of simultaneously addressing the afterlife journey of the deceased and the continued wellbeing of the mourners.

[v]This instruction not to dry one's hands with a cloth follows the ritual washing after attending a burial. It differs from normal ritual handwashing where drying is required. The practice symbolizes allowing any spiritual connection to death to dissipate naturally rather than being actively removed.

[A] Or: "And they should not wipe their hands with a towel" — The Hebrew 'מפה' can be translated as 'towel' rather than 'cloth', and 'ינגבו' can be rendered as 'wipe' rather than 'dry'. This alternate translation maintains the same meaning but uses different English equivalents that might be more natural in some contexts.

[B] Or: "The Rite of Repose" — This alternate translation is more concise and uses Christian-equivalent terminology that might be more familiar to some readers. However, it loses the specific Jewish cultural context of the 'Hashkavah' prayer, which is why I preferred keeping the original Hebrew term with an explanation.

[C] Or: "at the interment" — While 'interment' is a precise equivalent and more concise, I chose the more descriptive phrase to maintain accessibility for readers who might not be familiar with formal funerary terminology.

[1] This ritual washing after visiting a cemetery is called 'netilat yadayim' (washing of hands) and was practiced to remove spiritual impurity (tumah) associated with death. The prescription of exactly three pourings and the prohibition against drying with a cloth distinguishes this ritual from ordinary ritual handwashing before meals or prayer.

[2] The original text uses 'lev'aker ha-metim' (לבקר המתים), literally 'to visit the dead,' which is a common Hebrew expression for visiting cemeteries or graves. I've rendered this as 'visiting the graves' to maintain the meaning while using more natural English.

[i] The instruction to pour water three times reflects the standard Jewish practice for ritual purification, particularly after contact with death or a cemetery. The number three in Jewish mystical thought represents a complete cycle or process, suggesting that this triple pouring completely removes any spiritual impurity associated with death.

[ii] Cf. Masechet Semachot — This instruction is likely based on the concept that one should not retain any connection to the domain of death after leaving the cemetery. Allowing the hands to air dry serves as a symbolic separation between the worlds of the living and the dead. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 19, Discourse 3 — The instruction to pour water three times over the hands follows kabbalistic principles of purification, where the number three represents the complete removal of spiritual impurity associated with contact with death.

[iii] The term 'Hashkavah' (literally 'laying down') refers to a prayer for the repose of the deceased soul. The text indicates this was a regional custom rather than a universal practice at the time of writing.

[iv] This refers to the traditional seven-day mourning period (shiva) when mourners remain at home and receive visitors. The text prescribes reciting this prayer after each of the three daily prayer services during this period.

[1] This is a direct quote from the opening verse of Psalm 49. I've provided both the translation and the psalm number in parentheses for clarity, since the original text only references the opening words without explicitly identifying the psalm.

[2] The Hebrew "עֲוֹן עְקֵבַי" (iniquity of my heels) presents interpretive challenges. Some understand it to refer to sins that follow a person like footsteps, while others interpret it as referring to enemies who pursue the psalmist. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would likely be understood as the sins that accompany a person throughout life and are confronted at death.

[3] The original Hebrew "אָח לֹא־פָדֹה יִפְדֶּה אִישׁ" could also be translated as "No one can redeem a brother." Either translation conveys the essential message that no human can rescue another from death through wealth or influence, a theme central to Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on individual spiritual preparation.

[i] This is the opening phrase of Psalm 49, which begins 'Give ear, all inhabitants of the world.' The word 'cheled' (חלד) poetically refers to the transient world or temporal existence, making it particularly appropriate for a prayer concerning death.

[ii] Cf. Psalm 49 — Psalm 49 is specifically prescribed as the opening text for the Hashkavah prayer service. This psalm focuses on the transience of human life and wealth, making it particularly appropriate for funeral contexts. Its opening line 'Give ear, all inhabitants of the world' is directly referenced in the Hebrew text. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The Hashkavah prayer appears to be one of several structured liturgical sequences in Ma'avar Yabok for different stages of death rituals. It is specifically designed for recitation at the grave, during the seven days of mourning (shiva), and during subsequent cemetery visits. | Cf. Shiva — The reference to 'seven days' (shiva) indicates this prayer's integration into the traditional Jewish seven-day intensive mourning period following burial. This shows how Ma'avar Yabok incorporates established mourning customs while providing specific liturgical content for them.

[iii] This opening attribution identifies the psalm as being composed for or by the sons of Korah, Levites who served in the Temple. The psalm is introduced as being "For the chief musician," indicating its liturgical use.

[iv] The phrase "I will open my riddle with the harp" suggests that the psalm was originally meant to be accompanied by musical instruments, specifically the kinnor (harp or lyre). This reinforces its function as a liturgical text meant for public performance.

[v] The concept that one "cannot give to God his ransom" establishes a fundamental theological premise that wealth cannot purchase salvation or redemption from death, a theme that resonates strongly with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper spiritual preparation rather than material concerns.

[1]This difficult passage has been interpreted in various ways. Some understand it to mean that the righteous will have dominion over the wicked in the afterlife or in the messianic age ("the morning"). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would align with the book's focus on the rewards awaiting the righteous after death.

[2]The Hebrew "וְצוּרָם לְבַלּוֹת שְׁאוֹל מִזְּבֻל לוֹ" is particularly difficult and has been translated in various ways. The translation provided captures the sense that the physical form decays in Sheol, leaving behind the earthly dwelling that was so prized in life. This aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's distinction between the corruptible body and the eternal soul.

[3]The Hebrew "כִּי יִקָּחֵנִי" (for He shall receive me) echoes the language used for Enoch in Genesis 5:24, who was "taken" by God rather than experiencing death in the ordinary way. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this would suggest divine reception of the soul after death, a central theme of the book.

[4]The psalm concludes by returning to the theme introduced in verse 13, creating a circular structure that emphasizes its central message: without spiritual understanding, human status and

[i]The psalm concludes by repeating the comparison between uncomprehending humans and beasts, creating a circular structure that emphasizes its central message: without spiritual understanding, human status and wealth are meaningless in the face of death. This reinforces Ma'avar Yabok's call for proper spiritual preparation.

[ii]The metaphor comparing humans to sheep led to the slaughter, with death as their shepherd, is particularly poignant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which focuses on the soul's journey after death. This metaphor reverses the comforting image of God as shepherd (as in Psalm 23) with the stark reality of death's universal authority.

[iii]This verse represents the theological climax of the psalm—despite the universal reality of death, the psalmist expresses confidence that God will "redeem my soul from the power of Sheol." This hope for divine redemption beyond death aligns perfectly with Ma'avar Yabok's focus on the soul's transition and journey in the afterlife.

[iv]Cf. Psalm 39 — Both psalms serve as meditations on mortality, intended to put earthly concerns in perspective. In Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm appears in the Hashkavah (soul repose) prayer recited at the grave, reinforcing the book's central theme of preparing the soul for its transition beyond material existence. | Cf. Ecclesiastes — The psalm's message about the inability of wealth to save from death parallels Ecclesiastes' theme of vanity. In Ma'avar Yabok, this reinforces the book's emphasis on spiritual preparation rather than material concerns as the proper focus when facing mortality. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's Hashkavah prayer — The psalm's placement in the Hashkavah prayer sequence reflects its theological significance in Jewish burial traditions, where it serves as a reminder of the soul's eternal value contrasted with the transience of material wealth and physical life.

wealth are meaningless in the face of death. This reinforces Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper spiritual preparation and contemplation of mortality.

[1]These transitional instructions appear throughout Ma'avar Yabok to guide the reader through the proper sequence of prayers, particularly in rituals related to the sick, dying, and deceased. They establish the proper liturgical order that should be followed.

[2]This opening verse establishes the theological foundation of the entire prayer—that all divine actions, including death, emerge from God's perfect righteousness and faithfulness.

[3]The anthropomorphic language of God having a 'soul' (נַפְשׁוֹ/nafsho) that 'desires' (אִוְּתָה/ivtah) maintains the biblical wording while expressing divine sovereignty over life and death.

[4]The Hebrew 'יָשִׂים תְּהִלָּה' (yasim taholah) is difficult to translate precisely. It suggests God finds fault or attributes error even to angels. I've chosen 'charges with error' to convey this meaning of imputing imperfection.

[5]This harsh language about human insignificance serves an important ritual purpose within the funeral context—to help mourners accept mortality through humility rather than rebellion against divine judgment.

[6]This phrase 'Baruch Dayan HaEmet' is the traditional Jewish response upon hearing news of a death. By pronouncing this blessing within the funeral ritual, mourners acknowledge divine justice even in their grief.

[i]This is a standard liturgical instruction that appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok, indicating a transition between prayer elements. In this context, it directs the reader to proceed to the next prayer in the sequence after completing the previous one.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This standard formulaic transition phrase indicates to the reader that they should recite the prayer that follows after completing the previous one. It maintains the prescribed order of the deathbed ritual.

[iii]This verse from Psalms 145:17 begins the Tzidduk HaDin (Justification of Divine Judgment) prayer, recited at funerals to affirm that God's judgments, including death, are righteous.

[iv]This phrase expresses the theological concept that humans cannot question God's decisions, particularly regarding death. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it emphasizes acceptance of divine judgment as part of the mourning process.

[v]This verse from Job portrays death as the great equalizer that removes all social distinctions. In funeral contexts, this provides both comfort and a reminder of human mortality regardless of status.

[vi]The phrase 'Baruch Dayan HaEmet' (Blessed is the True Judge) is the traditional Jewish response upon hearing of someone's death, acknowledging divine justice even in loss.

[A] Or: "under the protective wings of the Shekhinah" — This alternative uses the untranslated term 'Shekhinah,' which more precisely conveys the feminine aspect of divine immanence in Jewish mysticism that is implied in the original Hebrew.

[1] This concluding verse from Ecclesiastes offers profound comfort by reframing death not as a tragedy but as the culmination of a life well-lived. In Ma'avar Yabok's theological framework, death represents the soul's crossing over to eternal reward.

[2] This reflects the flexibility built into Jewish liturgical practice, where standardized prayers often allow for personalization and adaptation to specific circumstances. The author provides core prayer structures but recognizes that different situations might call for additional biblical verses.

[3] The Hebrew 'menuchah nechonah' (proper rest) is a technical term in Jewish liturgy specifically referring to the soul's peaceful repose after death, while 'yeshivah ha-elyonah' refers to the heavenly academy where souls continue to study Torah.

[i] This surprising statement from Ecclesiastes offers a profound perspective shift for mourners—suggesting that death represents the culmination of a good life and the beginning of eternal reward, rather than merely an ending.

[ii] Cf. Psalms 145:17 — This verse begins the Tzidduk HaDin (Justification of Divine Judgment) prayer recited at Jewish funerals. It establishes the theological foundation that all God's actions, including death, are righteous and just. | Cf. Psalms 119:142 — The verse emphasizes that God's righteousness is eternal and His Torah represents absolute truth, providing comfort by placing individual death within a larger framework of divine justice. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 8:4 — In the context of Tzidduk HaDin, this verse applies royal authority metaphorically to God, whose decisions regarding life and death cannot be questioned by humans. | Cf. Job 23:13 — The verse emphasizes divine sovereignty in Ma'avar Yabok's theology of death—God alone determines the time of death, and no human can alter this decision. | Cf. Job 3:19 — In the context of funeral rituals, this verse offers the perspective that death removes all social distinctions, bringing both comfort (for the lowly) and humility (for the powerful). | Cf. Job 4:18 — Within Tzidduk HaDin, this verse serves to establish human fallibility—if even angels are imperfect before God, humans should accept divine judgment with humility. | Cf. Job 25:6 — The harsh metaphor of humans as worms serves the ritual purpose of creating humility and acceptance of mortality within the funeral context. | Cf. Deuteronomy 32:4 — In the context of Tzidduk HaDin, this verse reaffirms that despite the pain of loss, God's ways are perfect and just, offering theological comfort to mourners. | Cf. Ecclesiastes 7:1 — This concluding verse provides a profound perspective shift for mourners, suggesting that death represents the culmination of a life well-lived and the beginning of eternal reward, rather than merely an ending.

[iii] This phrase demonstrates the liturgical flexibility in Ma'avar Yabok. While the text provides structured prayer sequences with specific verses, it also acknowledges the need for adaptation based on circumstances. This adaptive approach is consistent with rabbinic attitudes toward prayer, balancing fixed liturgy with personal expression.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok liturgical structure — This is a standard liturgical instruction indicating flexibility in the ritual structure of Ma'avar Yabok. The author allows for adaptation of the prayer service by adding additional biblical verses according to the needs of the specific situation or preferences of the prayer leader, while maintaining the required core elements of the service.

[v] This refers to the concept of the heavenly academy or yeshiva, where souls of the righteous are believed to study Torah in the afterlife. This reflects the rabbinic concept that spiritual learning continues beyond death.

the pure and holy ones who shine and radiate like the brightness of the firmament,[A] with the upright and virtuous. With relief from bodily suffering, atonement for guilt, removal of transgression,[1] and the bringing near of salvation, with compassion and grace, and before the Dweller of the heavenly abode, and a good portion in the life of the World to Come. There shall be the allocated place for the soul and good name of the honorable [name of person] son/daughter of [mother's name], who has departed from this world by the will of God, Master of heaven and earth. May the King in His mercy establish him/her in a tent that shall never be moved.[B] May the King in His mercy spread His splendor and glory upon him/her. May the King in His mercy make his/her eternal rest pleasant. May the King in His mercy adorn him/her with the height of His glory. May the King in His mercy sweeten the power of His thunder and might upon him/her. May the King in His mercy extend His kindness over him/her. May the King in His mercy reveal the light of His pleasantness upon him/her. May the King in His mercy illuminate His goodness and life upon him/her. May the King in His mercy open

[A] Or: "who gleam and illuminate like the splendor of the firmament" — This alternative captures the active, ongoing nature of the souls' luminosity in the afterlife, emphasizing their role as sources of divine light.

[B] Or: "in an eternal pavilion that shall never be uprooted" — This alternative better captures the sense of permanence and majesty in the metaphorical dwelling place of the soul, drawing on the biblical allusion to Isaiah 33:20.

[1] The prayer distinguishes between different categories of sins that require purification: 'ashamot' (guilt/trespass offerings) and 'pesha' (rebellious transgression), reflecting the traditional Jewish categorization of sins.

[2] This repetitive formula appears thirteen times, likely corresponding to the Thirteen Attributes of Divine Mercy in Jewish tradition, creating a rhythmic litany that intensifies the prayer's emotional impact.

[i] The metaphor of being 'under the wings of the Divine Presence' appears frequently in rabbinic literature and liturgy, representing divine protection and intimacy with God in the afterlife.

[ii] This phrase alludes to Daniel 12:3, which describes the righteous shining like the brightness of the firmament in the afterlife, connecting this prayer to biblical eschatology.

[iii] The Aramaic phrase 'chulka tava' (good portion) is commonly used in Kaddish and other Aramaic prayers, expressing hope for a favorable portion in the World to Come.

[iv] This is an Aramaic phrase meaning 'who has departed from this world,' using the euphemistic term 'departed' rather than died, reflecting Jewish tradition's careful language about death.

[v] This phrase alludes to Isaiah 33:20, describing Jerusalem as 'a tent that will not be moved,' here applied to the eternal dwelling of the soul.

[A] Or: "And at the time of the final redemption may He establish him/her" — This alternative more explicitly conveys the messianic and eschatological implications of the Hebrew phrase 'ketz hayamin,' which specifically refers to the end-time redemption and resurrection.

[B] Or: "water him/her from the river of His divine pleasures" — This alternative better captures the sensual and mystical connotations of divine sustenance in the afterlife, emphasizing the direct nourishment from God.

[1] The Aramaic phrase 'eina pekicha' (watchful eye) is a kabbalistic term referring to divine providence. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this represents the protective spiritual supervision that guards the soul on its journey after death.

[2] This phrase ('tzror ha-chayyim') has become central to Jewish memorial prayers and is often inscribed on tombstones with the acronym ת.נ.צ.ב.ה (May his/her soul be bound in the bond of life).

[3] This biblical quotation from Isaiah 57:2 frames death as peaceful rest for the righteous, providing scriptural authority for the prayer's central theological message about death as a transition to divine peace.

[vi] 'The watchful eye' is a kabbalistic term referring to divine providence that is always vigilant and never sleeps, derived from Psalms 121:4.

[i] 'The end of days' (קץ הימין) refers to the messianic era and resurrection of the dead, expressing hope for the deceased's future revival.

[ii] This phrase draws from 1 Samuel 25:29, a traditional Jewish expression for the afterlife where souls are preserved with God, literally 'bound in the bond of life.'

[iii] Cf. Isaiah 57:2 — The prayer quotes this verse about the righteous finding peace in death as a central theme for the Hashkavah prayer, emphasizing the peaceful rest of the deceased. | Cf. Daniel 12:13 — The phrase 'at the end of days may He raise him up' alludes to this verse which promises resurrection 'at the end of days,' connecting the prayer to eschatological hope. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok—Seder section — This Hashkavah prayer forms part of the structured liturgical sequences in Ma'avar Yabok, specifically designed to be recited at the grave and during the seven days of mourning. | Cf. 1 Samuel 25:29 — The phrase 'bind his/her soul in the bond of life' references this verse, a traditional Jewish concept for the afterlife where souls are preserved with God. | Cf. Psalm 27:4 — The phrases 'to behold the pleasantness of the Lord and to visit in His palace' echo this psalm verse, expressing the soul's divine encounter in the afterlife. | Cf. Psalm 36:9-10 — The phrase 'stream of His delights' draws from this psalm, representing divine sustenance for the soul in the afterlife.

ואם היא נקבה[iv] יכנה בלשון נקבה[i]

He will swallow up death forever,[2] and the Lord GOD will wipe away tears from all faces, and the reproach of His people He will take away from all the earth; for the LORD has spoken. Your dead shall live, my corpse shall rise;[A] awake and sing, you who dwell in the dust! For your dew is like the dew of light,[3] and the earth shall cast out the dead.[B] And He has compassion on the living and on the dead; we know that He is abundant in kindness and truth. His judgment is true judgment, and God does not 4250R 4255R

[A] Or: "Your dead shall live, together with my dead body they shall arise" — This alternate translation better preserves the collective aspect of the resurrection as understood in Jewish eschatology, where 'my corpse' is interpreted as referring to the collective body of Israel. This is closer to the King James Version and better aligns with how this verse from Isaiah 26:19 is traditionally understood in Jewish resurrection theology.

[B] Or: "and the earth shall give birth to the shades" — The Hebrew term 'רְפָאִים' (rephaim) specifically refers to shades or spirits of the dead, rather than simply 'the dead.' Additionally, the verb 'תַּפִּיל' can connote both 'casting out' and 'bringing forth' (as in childbirth). This alternate translation better captures the metaphorical rebirth implied in the resurrection imagery.

[1] The Hebrew text literally says 'refer to [the deceased] in feminine language.' This reflects the grammatical structure of Hebrew, which requires gender agreement for verbs, pronouns, and adjectives. When reciting prayers for a deceased woman, all masculine grammatical forms in the prayer must be changed to their feminine equivalents.

[2] This quotation from Isaiah 25:8 is understood in Jewish tradition as referring to the messianic era when death will be eliminated. In Ma'avar Yabok, it serves to place current death and burial practices within an eschatological framework where death is ultimately overcome.

[3] The Hebrew 'טַל אוֹרֹת' (tal orot) literally 'dew of lights' is a kabbalistic concept referring to the divine life-giving emanation that will resurrect the dead. In Jewish mystical tradition, this heavenly dew is preserved above the highest heaven specifically for the purpose of resurrection.

[iv] This instruction appears within the context of the Hashkavah prayer (memorial prayer) for the deceased, directing the prayer leader to modify all the masculine pronouns and verb conjugations to feminine forms when the deceased is female. In Hebrew, unlike English, verbs, adjectives, and pronouns must agree in gender with their subject.

[i] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This instruction appears in the section dealing with the Hashkavah prayer (prayer for the repose of the soul) recited at the grave and during the seven days of mourning (shiva). It instructs the prayer leader to modify the gender-specific language in the prayer when it is being recited for a deceased woman, changing masculine pronouns and verb forms to feminine ones in Hebrew.

[ii] This phrase from Isaiah 26:19 uses the term 'rephaim' (רְפָאִים), which specifically refers to the shades or spirits of the dead. The imagery here describes the earth 'giving birth' to these spirits during resurrection, creating a powerful metaphor of death as a womb preparing for new life.

[iii] This phrase 'His judgment is true judgment' appears in the traditional Jewish prayer 'Tzidduk Ha-Din' (Justification of the Divine Judgment) recited at funerals. Its inclusion here reflects Ma'avar Yabok's integration of established liturgical elements into its framework for death rituals.

[iv] Cf. Isaiah 25:8 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse serves as a theological foundation for comfort during burial rituals, affirming that death is not the final reality but will ultimately be overcome in divine redemption. The book uses this eschatological vision to provide hope even in the midst of current loss. | Cf. Isaiah 26:19 — This text appears in Ma'avar Yabok as part of prayers recited at the graveside, offering the theological assurance of bodily resurrection. The metaphor of 'dew of light' represents divine life-giving power that will revive the dead. In kabbalistic thought, this

וְנָחֲךָ יְיָ תָּמִיד וְהַשְׂבִּיעַ בְּצַחֲצָחוֹת

And the LORD will guide you always,[3] and satisfy

[A] Or: "His judgment is true judgment, and God judges a person with consideration beyond their guilt" — The original Hebrew is somewhat ambiguous. The word 'אֵל' here could be interpreted as 'God' (as a divine name) or as a negative particle. This alternate translation suggests that God does indeed judge, but with mercy that considers factors beyond mere guilt, which fits better with the conclusion about not arousing His full wrath.

[B] Or: "Ve-Hu Rachum" — The prayer is commonly known by its Hebrew name 'Ve-Hu Rachum' in liturgical contexts, so keeping the Hebrew term with transliteration might be preferable in some scholarly contexts.

[C] Or: "three repetitions" — The term could be translated more formally as 'repetitions' rather than 'times' in a scholarly context.

[1] The Hebrew uses the simple יאמר (literally 'he shall say'), but in liturgical contexts this typically refers to formal recitation, especially for established prayers like 'Ve-Hu Rachum.'

[2] This indicates a responsorial pattern common in Jewish liturgy, where the leader recites a prayer and the congregation repeats it or responds with a set phrase. This communal aspect of the ritual reinforces the protective power of the prayer.

[3] This verse from Isaiah 58:11 begins a passage that appears in Ma'avar Yabok's funeral liturgy, where prophetic promises of national restoration are reinterpreted as promises about the soul's journey after death.

dew (tal) is associated with the divine flow from the sefirah of Chokhmah that will revitalize the dead at the time of resurrection. | Cf. Psalm 78:38 — This phrase echoes Psalm 78:38, which describes God's compassion despite human sinfulness. In Ma'avar Yabok, this reference serves to reassure mourners that divine judgment is tempered with mercy, even after death. It reflects the book's theological emphasis that God's judgment of the deceased is not based solely on their transgressions but is mitigated by divine compassion. | Cf. Midrash Tehillim — This formulation reflects midrashic teachings on God's dual attributes of mercy (rachamim) and judgment (din). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this serves as a meditation on divine justice that encourages acceptance of death while providing comfort that the deceased will be judged with compassion. This balance of accepting divine judgment while hoping for mercy is central to Jewish approaches to death.

[i] This refers to the opening words of Psalm 78:38: 'And He, being merciful, forgives iniquity and does not destroy; He frequently turns His anger away and does not arouse all His wrath.' In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is considered to have special protective power during burial rituals.

[ii] The threefold recitation is significant in Jewish mystical practice, with the number three often representing completeness or spiritual power. In the context of burial rituals, this triple recitation is believed to neutralize negative spiritual forces.

[iii] Cf. Psalm 78:38 — The prayer 'Ve-Hu Rachum' is a direct quote from Psalm 78:38, which speaks of God's mercy and forgiveness. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is recited three times during burial rituals, particularly when throwing earth into the grave, as it is believed to have protective power against negative spiritual forces. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 18, Discourse 3 — This passage refers to a specific ritual instruction from Ma'avar Yabok where the prayer 'Ve-Hu Rachum' is recited three times during burial rites. The text explains that this threefold recitation helps to weaken 'the heads of the destroyer' (ראשי המשחית) and provides protection against the suffering of 'the beating of the grave' (חבוט הקבר).

In Chapter 2 of Discourse 3, it states that it is good to give at least six perutot (small coins)[B] as atonement

[D]Or: "and satisfy your soul with brightness" — The term 'צַחֲצָחוֹת' (tzachtzachot) can be understood as referring to 'brightness' or 'radiance' in kabbalistic contexts rather than 'parched places.' In Ma'avar Yabok's mystical framework, this could reference the divine light that nourishes the soul after death.

[A]Or: "one who seals spiritual ruptures" — In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which deals with death rituals, 'breach' (פֶּרֶץ) often refers to spiritual ruptures between worlds that need repair. The deceased person is being honored as one who helped restore cosmic harmony.

[B]Or: "that it is proper to give no fewer than six perutot (small coins)" — This alternate translation emphasizes the ritual prescription aspect more strongly than the benefit-oriented phrasing of 'it is good.' This could be preferable in contexts where the focus is on ritual requirements rather than spiritual benefits.

[C]Or: "as ransom for the soul of the departed" — The term 'kofer' literally means 'ransom'

[1]In the funeral context of Ma'avar Yabok, this phrase suggests that the deceased person's good deeds and teachings continue to support future generations, creating an enduring legacy.

[iv]The phrase 'strengthen your bones' takes on special significance in Ma'avar Yabok's context of death rituals, as it suggests resurrection. The Hebrew verb יַחֲלִיץ (yachalitz) implies not just strengthening but revitalization and liberation.

[i]The image of a 'watered garden' appears throughout rabbinic literature as a metaphor for the Garden of Eden, where souls find rest after death.

[ii]These honorific titles ('repairer of the breach, restorer of paths') are applied to the deceased, suggesting that their good deeds in life created cosmic repair (tikkun) that continues to benefit both the living and the dead.

[iii]Cf. Isaiah 58:11-12 — This passage appears in Ma'avar Yabok as part of the prayers recited after burial or during cemetery visits. The text is repurposed from its original context (where it promised national restoration) to offer comfort regarding the soul's journey after death, suggesting that the deceased will be divinely guided, spiritually nourished, and remembered as one who repaired breaches in the world. | Cf. Psalm 121 — The opening phrase "וְנָחֲךָ יְיָ תָּמִיד" (The LORD will guide you always) echoes Psalm 121:8's "יְיָ יִשְׁמָר־צֵאתְךָ וּבוֹאֶךָ" (The LORD will guard your going out and coming in). This creates a textual connection suggesting that the same God who protected the person in life will guide them in death. | Cf. Garden of Eden imagery — The phrase "כְּגַן רָוֶה וּכְמוֹצָא מַיִם" (like a watered garden, like a spring of water) alludes to Garden of Eden imagery, suggesting that the deceased's soul will dwell in paradise. Throughout Ma'avar Yabok, the afterlife is frequently described using Eden imagery, with the soul being 'watered' by divine light.

[iv]The text begins with a self-reference to another section of Ma'avar Yabok, specifically Chapter 2 of Discourse 3. This cross-referencing is common throughout the work, showing how different sections are intended to be read in connection with each other.

[v]The specification of six coins likely has kabbalistic significance, possibly corresponding to the six directions of space (north, south, east, west, up, down) or the six working days of the week, symbolizing completeness in the physical realm.

[vi]The concept of 'kofer nefesh' (ransom/atonement for the soul) derives from Exodus 30:12 where it refers to a half-shekel given to prevent plague. In this post-biblical context, it has been adapted to refer to charitable giving that serves as spiritual atonement for the deceased.

[i]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 21 of Discourse 2 — The author cross-references an earlier section that elaborates on the theological basis for charitable giving as atonement for the deceased.

בפרק כ״א מתבאר כי הבעלי תורה או העניים הנהנים מו

In Chapter 21, it is explained that Torah scholars or poor people[3] who benefit from charitable donations and appears in this sense in biblical contexts. This more literal translation might be preferred in scholarly contexts where the connection to biblical terminology is important to preserve.

[A] Or: "I hereby donate this coin for tzedakah" — The Hebrew term 'tzedakah' carries broader connotations than the English 'charity,' implying righteous obligation rather than voluntary generosity. This alternate preserves the Hebrew term which may be preferable in some contexts.

[B] Or: "for the rest of his soul in Gan Eden" — Preserving the Hebrew term 'Gan Eden' might be preferred in certain Jewish contexts rather than the English 'Garden of Eden,' particularly when maintaining the traditional terminology is important.

[2] The text indicates that a declaration should be recited six times, once with each coin donated. This practice combines material giving with verbal declaration, creating a complete ritual act that engages both action and speech.

[1] Including 'all Israel' in the charity declaration multiplies its spiritual efficacy through the collective merit of the community, a concept frequently emphasized in Ma'avar Yabok.

[2] This biblical verse is understood as creating a spiritual defense for the departed soul against potential accusers in the divine court, reflecting Ma'avar Yabok's concern with protecting the soul during its post-mortem journey.

[3] The Hebrew phrase 'בעלי תורה או העניים' literally means 'masters of Torah or the poor,' distinguishing between those who might receive charity based on their Torah scholarship versus those who receive it due to financial need.

This reference establishes continuity between theoretical discussions and practical ritual instructions. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Bava Batra 10a — The practice of giving coins for the deceased likely draws on the Talmudic concept that charity has redemptive power, potentially benefiting the deceased in the afterlife.

[ii] A perutah is a small coin of minimal value in Jewish law. The focus here is not on the amount of charity but on the ritual act of giving, which creates spiritual merit for the deceased.

[iii] Gan Eden (Garden of Eden) in Jewish thought refers to the heavenly paradise where righteous souls dwell after death. In Ma'avar Yabok, it specifically refers to the spiritual realm where the soul finds rest after completing its journey through various post-mortem stages.

[iv] The prayer concludes with a verse from Isaiah 54:17, which is understood in kabbalistic contexts to provide spiritual protection against negative forces or accusers that might impede the soul's peaceful transition to the afterlife.

[v] Cf. Isaiah 54:17 — This biblical verse is included to invoke divine protection for the deceased's soul against spiritual accusers or negative forces during its journey to the afterlife. In Ma'avar Yabok, biblical verses are understood to create spiritual protection for the soul's transition. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 21, Discourse 3 — This prayer reflects the concept explained in Chapter 21 that those who benefit from charity given in memory of the deceased should verbally acknowledge that the merit is for the departed's soul. This creates a spiritual transaction that benefits the deceased in the afterlife. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 2, Discourse 3 — This chapter explains that one should give at least six perutot (small coins) as atonement for the deceased's soul and recite this formula with each donation. The practice connects the physical act of charity with spiritual benefit for the departed.

[A] Or: "And He, being compassionate, will forgive iniquity" — This translation captures the more emotional aspect of 'rachum' as compassionate rather than merely merciful, and uses 'forgive' which is a common alternative for 'y'chaper' in liturgical contexts.

[B] Or: "through this enjoyment that I am experiencing due to [name]" — The term 'hana'ah' can refer to benefit, pleasure, or enjoyment. In this context, it refers to the charitable funds or Torah learning being enjoyed by the recipient, which spiritually benefits the deceased.

[C] Or: "May his nefesh rest well with the lot of the righteous" — This translation specifically preserves the technical term 'nefesh' (vital soul) rather than the general 'soul,' and uses 'lot' for 'goral' which has biblical resonances of divinely appointed destiny.

[1] The concept of 'לכפרת נפשו' (for the atonement of his soul) reflects the Jewish belief that charitable acts performed in a deceased person's name or with their resources can help elevate their soul and atone for any transgressions, particularly during the first year after death.

[2] This section refers specifically to the nefesh (vital soul), which in kabbalistic thought remains connected to the body even after death. The prayer expresses hope that this aspect of the soul will find proper rest among the righteous.

[3] This section addresses the ruach (spirit), which in kabbalistic thought ascends to the terrestrial Garden of Eden after death to enjoy communion with other righteous souls.

[i] This refers to the Jewish custom that charitable bequests made by the deceased are particularly effective for their soul's elevation during the first year after death, which is considered a critical period of judgment and transition in the afterlife.

[ii] This reflects the belief that verbal acknowledgment by the beneficiary creates a spiritual mechanism that channels the merit of the charitable act directly to the deceased's soul, facilitating its atonement and elevation.

[iii] Cf. Tziduk HaDin prayer — This instruction is related to the broader funeral and mourning rituals in Judaism, particularly connected to the Tziduk HaDin (Justification of Divine Judgment) concept, where charitable giving serves as a mechanism for atonement of the deceased. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 21 — The text is referring to an earlier section of itself, specifically Chapter 21, which apparently contains more detailed explanation of these charitable practices and their spiritual significance for the deceased.

[iv] This prayer would be recited by someone benefiting from charity or Torah study performed in memory of the deceased. According to Jewish tradition, such meritorious acts create spiritual merit that can benefit the soul of the departed.

[v] The text uses 'ploni ben plonit' (so-and-so son of so-and-so) as a placeholder where the name of the deceased person and their mother's name would be inserted. Following Jewish tradition, the mother's name is used when praying for someone's soul.

[vi] This reflects the kabbalistic understanding that the nefesh (lowest level of the soul) remains connected to the body even after death and finds rest among the righteous.

[vii] According to kabbalistic tradition, the ruach (middle level of the soul) ascends to the terrestrial Garden of Eden to enjoy the company of other righteous souls.

[viii] The neshamah (highest level of the soul) is believed to ascend to the highest spiritual realms to enjoy the 'hidden good' (tov ha-tzafun), a reference to the divine radiance reserved for the righteous in the World to Come.

בִּצְרוֹר הַחַיִּים אֶת יְיָ אֱלֹהֵינוּ עִם כָּל שְׁאָר הַצַּדִּיקִים שֶׁבְּגַן עֵדֶן: (ולנקבה יאמר בלשון נקבה) [i]

And if he and his household members are benefiting,[A] he should say: "through this benefit that benefits us[B] on behalf of the soul of [name of [D] Or: "and may his higher soul take pleasure in the concealed good" — This alternate clarifies the meaning of 'neshamah' as the highest level of soul in Jewish mystical thought, and captures the concept of 'tzafun' as something concealed or reserved specifically for the righteous in the World to Come.

[A] Or: "And if he and his family members are the ones receiving benefit" — This alternate translation makes it clearer that the instruction refers to cases where the person reciting the prayer and their family are directly receiving the charitable funds designated for the deceased's merit.

[B] Or: "he should say regarding the benefit that provides for us" — This alternative captures the sense of acknowledging receipt of material support, which is implied in the original Hebrew term 'הנאה' (benefit/enjoyment).

[1] This phrase comes from 1 Samuel 25:29 and has become a standard Jewish expression for the afterlife, commonly inscribed on tombstones with the acronym ה.ב.צ.נ.ח (May his/her soul be bound in the bundle of life).

[2] The Hebrew prayer would require grammatical changes when referring to a female deceased, changing masculine verb forms and pronouns to feminine ones. This instruction ensures proper grammatical addressing of the deceased's soul.

[i] Cf. Psalm 78:38 — This psalm verse establishes the prayer's theological foundation that God mercifully forgives sins. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this quote connects the charitable act being performed to divine forgiveness for the deceased, suggesting that God's merciful nature will be activated through the meritorious deed. | Cf. 1 Samuel 25:29 — This biblical reference has become a standard Jewish expression for the afterlife. In Ma'avar Yabok, it expresses the hope that the deceased's soul will be gathered into divine protection. The phrase appears on Jewish tombstones and in memorial prayers, representing the soul's secure preservation with God after death. | Cf. Zohar, Terumah 142a — This prayer reflects the Zoharic concept that the different soul components have distinct posthumous experiences: the nefesh rests with the body, the ruach experiences pleasure in the terrestrial Garden of Eden, and the neshamah ascends to enjoy the 'hidden goodness' in the celestial realms. The prayer's differentiated language for each soul-level reflects this kabbalistic understanding. | Cf. Bava Batra 11a — This prayer presupposes the Talmudic concept that charitable acts benefit the souls of the deceased. When recited by someone receiving charity or Torah study in the deceased's merit, it acknowledges the theological principle that these actions create real spiritual benefit for the departed soul, helping to elevate it to the 'portion of the righteous.'

[ii] The term 'נהנים' (benefiting/enjoying) specifically refers to receiving material support from charitable funds that were donated in memory of the deceased person.

[iii] The phrase 'בעבור נפש פלוני' (on behalf of the soul of [name]) reflects the Jewish belief that charitable acts performed in memory of the deceased create merit for their souls in the afterlife. This verbal acknowledgment by the recipient completes the spiritual circuit, directing the merit to the deceased's soul.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 2, Chapter 21 — This passage appears in a section explaining how those who benefit from charity given in memory of the deceased should verbally acknowledge this benefit as directed toward the soul of the departed person. This creates spiritual merit for the deceased's soul. | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Tractate Berachot 46b — This instruction in Ma'avar Yabok adapts the talmudic concept of verbal acknowledgment during blessings to create merit for the deceased, applying it specifically to cases where one receives charity given in the deceased's memory.

is supported by the Mishnah in the third chapter

[3] In the original text, ‘פלוני’ (ploni) is a placeholder for the deceased person’s name. When actually reciting this formula, one would substitute the actual name of the deceased person.

[4] The Hebrew text uses a plural verb form (התפללו) indicating this is an instruction for multiple people conducting funeral or memorial rituals, likely members of the burial society (Chevra Kadisha).

[1] This reflects the kabbalistic belief that different components of the soul have different fates after death. While the higher aspects (ruach and neshamah) may ascend to celestial realms, the nefesh (vital soul) remains connected to the body in the grave for a period, requiring specific prayers and attention.

[2] The Hebrew uses the abbreviation ‘וגו” (ve-gomer—‘and so forth’) twice, indicating that the prayer leader should recite the complete verses which would have been familiar to the audience. The first verse is Isaiah 58:11, which continues: ‘and satisfy your soul in drought, and make fat your bones; and you shall be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not.’ The second verse’s exact reference is less certain but may be from Psalm 4:8 or similar peaceful rest passages.

[3] The opening phrase has echoes of Proverbs 4:11, giving the instruction about tahara rituals a scriptural tone and authority.

[i] This passage distinguishes between three levels of the Jewish soul as understood in Kabbalah: nefesh (vital soul), ruach (spirit), and neshamah (higher soul). Each requires different types of spiritual attention after death. The terms used for each are precise: ‘margoah’ (repose/calm) for nefesh, ‘menuchot’ (rest) for ruach, and ‘idun’ (delight/refinement) for neshamah, reflecting their different spiritual qualities.

[ii] According to kabbalistic tradition reflected in Ma’avar Yabok, while the higher aspects of the soul (ruach and neshamah) ascend to spiritual realms, the nefesh remains connected to the physical remains in the grave for a period after death. This passage reveals the belief that even after addressing the soul’s higher aspects, one must still pray for the nefesh dwelling with the physical remains and for the bones themselves.

[iii] Cf. Isaiah 58:11 — The verse is applied to the deceased, transforming a promise originally made to the living into a prayer for the dead. It specifically mentions both the soul’s guidance and the strengthening of bones, making it particularly appropriate for funeral prayers that address both spiritual and physical aspects of the deceased. | Cf. Jeremiah 14:13 or Psalm 4:8 — The phrase is repurposed in Ma’avar Yabok as part of burial prayers, transforming the biblical promise of peaceful sleep into a prayer for peaceful rest in death. This reflects the Jewish understanding of death as ‘sleep’ and the grave as a ‘bed,’ terminology found throughout rabbinic literature. | Cf. Ma’avar Yabok — This passage reveals the book’s consistent approach to soul care after death: each component of the soul (nefesh, ruach, neshamah) requires specific prayers and attention. The text emphasizes that even after praying for the higher aspects of the soul, one must still attend to the nefesh that remains connected to the physical remains in the grave, reflecting kabbalistic teachings about the soul’s division after death.

of Taharot concerning a child and donkey found among graves, where their vessels remain pure. Now my flesh and heart yearn to offer you additional verses[1] which, by the way, I found in a small pamphlet about the ritual washing of the deceased from the Sages of the Mishnah. Also, regarding the inquiry about proper intentions, it was necessary to join to these verses the appropriate actions, for the intention is profound. For at first glance these might seem like laws without reasons, but the reward of learning comes through understanding. If they do not help in matters of practice, I have still benefited you by bringing these under the wings of the Divine Presence from the mouths of great authorities from whom this order emerged. For the essence of the acts of kindness performed with the deceased is the intention behind each detail of the actions, besides which those knowledgeable in the words of the Sages will understand from the sequence of these verses many suitable intentions concerning the secret of washing. These matters are concealed,[A] and of them it is said, "The reward of the house of mourning is silence."[B] Indeed, even reading them in their simple meaning adds strength.

My innermost parts rejoiced[C] when I found support in this pamphlet for immersing the deceased in nine measures of water, and it states that this consti-

[A] Or: "These matters are kept secret" — The term 'כמוסי" specifically refers to matters deliberately kept hidden or secret, rather than merely being obscure or concealed, suggesting the esoteric nature of these mystical teachings.

[B] Or: "the merit of the house of the impure is silence" — This Aramaic phrase could be translated more literally as 'the merit of the house of the impure is silence,' where 'house of the impure' refers to the place of death or mourning. This might better preserve the original's connection to ritual purity concepts.

[C] Or: "My inner organs rejoiced greatly" — The Hebrew uses a physical, visceral expression that could be rendered more literally to capture the author's strong emotional reaction to finding textual support for his views.

[1] The author uses emotional, almost poetic language to express his eagerness to share this discovered text, showing his personal investment in proper death rituals.

[i] This refers to Mishnah Taharot 3:7, which states that if a child or donkey (who cannot understand death and impurity) is found among graves, the vessels they carry remain ritually pure. The author uses this as a basis for discussing ritual washing without concern for impurity.

[ii] The author suggests that beyond the literal meaning of the verses he will present, those well-versed in rabbinic teachings will recognize deeper mystical meanings related to the purification ritual.

[iii] This Aramaic phrase from the Babylonian Talmud (Berakhot 6b) means "the reward of the house of mourning is silence," suggesting that some mystical aspects of death rituals are best left unspoken.

tutes the ritual immersion of the deceased, just as the Lord aroused my spirit initially to warn about this in the third discourse. I have merited to direct my thoughts toward the truth, for the language of truth will be established forever. These are the verses that appear there, aligned with the washing of the limbs of the pious deceased.[1] It is clear that the Sages did not speak such words about an ordinary person, but rather about one who was stringent and sanctified himself during his lifetime. And one who is truly wise understands and fulfills all the words of the Sages in their proper manner.

עוד פסוקים לאמר בעת רחיצת אדם גדול [iii] [ii]

Additional verses to recite during the washing of a distinguished person[2]

[1]The term ‘pious deceased’ (הנפטר החסיד) suggests that the highest level of ritual treatment was reserved for those who lived lives of exceptional religious observance.

[2]This section presents a collection of biblical verses specifically designated for the tahara (ritual washing) of an ‘adam gadol’—a person of significance. The organization follows the human body from top to bottom, providing appropriate verses for each body part being washed.

[iv]The author is pleased to have found confirmation for his view that nine measures (kavim) of water constitute proper ritual immersion for the deceased, a point he had previously argued in his work.

[i]Cf. Mishnah Taharot 3:7 — The author uses this mishnah to establish a connection between ritual purity and the washing of the deceased, suggesting that there is textual precedent for his approach to tahara rituals. | Cf. Ma’avar Yabok, Discourse 3 — The author references his own previous work where he instructed about washing the deceased with nine measures of water, and expresses satisfaction at finding confirmation of this practice in an ancient text.

[ii]The phrase ‘adam gadol’ (distinguished person) typically refers to someone of significant Torah learning or communal importance. The text indicates that these special verses should be recited specifically when washing the body of such an eminent individual, suggesting that different ritual practices might apply based on the deceased’s status.

[iii]Cf. Song of Songs 3:7-8 — These verses from Song of Songs are repurposed in Ma’avar Yabok as part of the tahara (ritual washing) ceremony. In their original context, they describe Solomon’s bed surrounded by guards, but in this funerary context, they symbolize spiritual protection for the deceased’s soul during the vulnerable transition from life to death. | Cf. Song of Songs 5:11-16 — These verses from Song of Songs describe the physical beauty of the beloved in detail from head to toe. In Ma’avar Yabok, they are reappropriated as a mystical template for the tahara washing ritual, with each body part mentioned corresponding to a section of the body to be washed, creating a correspondence between the physical washing and spiritual purification. | Cf. Song of Songs 7:5-6 — These verses from Song of Songs praising the beloved’s beauty are repurposed in Ma’avar Yabok for the washing ritual. In the original context they express romantic admiration, but in the funerary context, they create a dignified, sacred framework for handling the deceased’s body. | Cf. Exodus 14:31 — This verse from Exodus about the Israelites witnessing God’s power at the Red Sea is repurposed in Ma’avar Yabok specifically for washing the deceased’s hands. The symbolic connection lies in the ‘hand’ mentioned in the verse, creating a correspondence between the biblical text and the physical act being performed. | Cf. Psalm 84:2-8 — The verse about standing on level ground in the assembly echoes Psalm 84’s themes of journeying to God’s dwelling place. In Ma’avar Yabok, this takes on added significance as it relates to the soul’s journey after death. | Cf. Isaiah 6:2-3 — These verses from Isaiah’s throne vision are incorporated into Ma’avar Yabok’s washing ritual. In their original context, they describe Isaiah’s vision of God surrounded by seraphim proclaiming holiness. In the funerary context, they invoke angelic protection for the deceased and establish a connection between the deceased’s soul and the divine realm.

Behold, Solomon's bed,[3] surrounded by sixty mighty men from the mighty ones of Israel. All of them wielding swords, skilled in battle, each with his sword upon his thigh because of fear in the nights. His head is like fine gold, his locks are wavy, black as a raven. Your head upon you is like Carmel, and the hair of your head like purple; a king is bound in the tresses. His left hand is under my head, and his right hand embraces me. Let peace come, let them rest on their beds, he who walks uprightly. What is man that You take knowledge of him, or the son of man that You think of him? You have made him a little lower than God, and crowned him with glory and honor. To the Lord our God belong mercy and forgiveness,[1] for we have rebelled against Him (and he shall recite the Thirteen Attributes as one reading from the Torah). Your two breasts are like two fawns, twins of a gazelle. Your navel is like a round goblet that never lacks mixed wine; your belly is like a heap of wheat encircled with lilies. His stomach is like polished ivory overlaid with sapphires. And Israel saw the great hand which the LORD performed in Egypt, and the people feared the LORD, and they believed in the LORD and in Moses His servant. For with a strong hand he will send them away, and with a strong hand he will drive them out of his land. His hands are rods of gold filled with beryl. The curves of your thighs are like jewels,[2] the work of a master craftsman. And the children of Israel went out with a high hand. And I will remember My covenant with Jacob, and also My covenant with Isaac, and also My covenant with Abraham I will remember, and I will remember the land. His legs are pillars of marble set upon sockets of fine gold; his appearance is like Lebanon, choice as cedars. My foot stands on level ground; in the congregations I will bless the LORD. He preserves the feet of His faithful ones. The LORD spoke to you face to face on the mountain from the midst of the fire. I stood between the LORD and you at that time, to declare to you the word of the LORD;

[3]The compilation of biblical verses in this passage serves a specific ritual purpose in Ma'avar Yabok. These verses are to be recited during the tahara (ritual washing of the deceased), with different verses corresponding to different body parts, following a top-down anatomical order.

[1]This verse from Daniel 9:9 introduces a transition in the ritual, where the focus shifts from describing the body to invoking divine mercy. The instruction to recite the Thirteen Attributes follows naturally from this appeal to divine compassion.

[2]The alternation between masculine and feminine imagery throughout this passage reflects the mystical concept of the soul's fluid nature. In kabbalistic thought, the soul contains both masculine and feminine aspects regardless of the deceased's biological gender.

ובשפיכת ט׳ קבין[ii] אחר הרחיצה[iii] יאמר:[iv]

And when pouring[2] the nine measures of water[3] after the washing, he shall say: 4410R

[1]The passage concludes with the Priestly Blessing from Numbers 6:24-26, which invokes divine light, grace, and peace upon the deceased. This blessing forms a fitting conclusion to the ritual washing prayers, expressing hope for the soul's peaceful journey.

[2]This ritual pouring of water represents the final and most significant purification act in the tahara process. In kabbalistic understanding, it symbolizes the complete spiritual cleansing of the deceased, washing away any remaining spiritual impurities before burial and facilitating the soul's transition to the next world.

[3]The Hebrew term 'kav' (קב) is a specific volume measurement in rabbinic literature. Rather than converting to modern measurements, I've rendered it as 'measures' to preserve the ritual significance of the specific number nine, which is important in kabbalistic thought as representing the nine sefirot below Keter or the nine chambers of divine judgment.

[i]Cf. Song of Songs — These verses from Song of Songs appear in Ma'avar Yabok specifically as part of the tahara ritual (washing of the deceased), where different biblical verses are recited for different body parts, following a top-down order from head to feet. This practice is based on the kabbalistic concept that the human form mirrors divine structures. | Cf. Isaiah 57:2 — This verse appears frequently in Ma'avar Yabok's funeral prayers to express hope for the deceased's peaceful transition. It is particularly significant as it connects to the book's central metaphor of 'crossing over' to peaceful rest. | Cf. Psalm 8:5-6 — These verses reflect on the dignity of the human being despite mortality. In the context of tahara rituals, they remind those performing the washing of the inherent dignity of the deceased as a being created in the divine image. | Cf. Exodus 14:31 — This verse about Israel witnessing God's 'great hand' in Egypt is recited during the washing of the deceased's hands, creating a correspondence between the physical act of washing and spiritual redemption. | Cf. Leviticus 26:42 — This verse invoking God's covenant with the patriarchs serves as a plea for divine mercy for the deceased, based on ancestral merit rather than personal worthiness.

[ii]The phrase 'ט׳ קבין' (nine kav) refers to a specific measurement of water used in the tahara ritual (purification of the deceased). A kav is an ancient measure of volume approximately equal to 1.2-1.4 liters, making the total volume around 10-12 liters. This specific quantity has ritual significance in Jewish law.

[iii]The term 'רחיצה' (rechitzah/washing) here refers to the initial cleaning of the deceased's body, which is followed by the ritual pouring of the nine measures of water as the culminating purification act of the tahara process.

[iv]Cf. Chapter 12 of the Third Discourse — The passage refers to the ritual of pouring nine measures (kav) of water over the deceased's body as the final step of the tahara (purification) ritual. Chapter 12 of the Third Discourse in Ma'avar Yabok details the types of aromatic substances that should be added to this water and their spiritual significance. | Cf. Chapter 10 of the Third Discourse — This brief instruction is directly connected to Chapter 10 of the Third Discourse in Ma'avar Yabok, which explains that the nine measures of water represent the final spiritual purification of the deceased, symbolically washing away any remaining spiritual impurities before burial.

When the Lord has washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion[4] and cleansed the bloodstains of Jerusalem from her midst, by a spirit of judgment and a spirit of burning. And he saw that the first portion was his, for there the commander's allotment was reserved; and he came with the heads of the people, he executed the justice of the LORD, and His judgments with Israel. His eyes are like doves by streams of water, washed with milk, sitting by fullness.[1] Your nose is like the tower of Lebanon overlooking Damascus. Thus says the LORD: Behold, I will restore the fortunes of Jacob's tents, and have compassion on his dwellings; the city shall be built upon its mound, and the palace shall stand where it belongs. I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall exult in my God; for He has clothed me with garments of salvation, He has wrapped me with a robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom puts on a priestly crown, and as a bride adorns herself with her jewels.[2] Your dead shall live, my corpse shall rise; awake and sing, you who dwell in the dust, for your dew is a dew of light,[3] and the earth shall cast out the shades. And Moses went up to God, and the LORD called to him from the mountain, saying, "Thus you shall say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel: You have seen what I did to [4]This opening verse establishes a parallel between divine purification described in Isaiah and the ritual purification (tahara) being performed. The washing of the deceased's body is understood as a reflection of divine cleansing.

[1]The verses from Song of Songs are used in a specific sequence during the tahara ritual, with different verses corresponding to different body parts. These poetic descriptions elevate the physical act of washing into a sacred ritual with mystical significance.

[2]This verse is particularly meaningful in the context of dressing the deceased in shrouds (tachrichim) after washing. Just as the physical body is dressed in white garments, the soul is understood to be clothed in 'garments of salvation' in the afterlife.

[3]The Hebrew phrase 'tal orot' (dew of light) has special kabbalistic significance, referring to the divine emanation that will resurrect the dead. This verse affirms the Jewish belief in bodily resurrection, providing comfort during the tahara ritual.

[i]This verse from Isaiah 4:4 appears at the beginning of the tahara ritual, specifically at the point when water is poured over the deceased. The imagery of divine cleansing creates a parallel between the physical act of washing the body and the spiritual purification of the soul.

[ii]This verse from Song of Songs 5:12 is specifically recited when washing the deceased's eyes during the tahara ritual. Ma'avar Yabok prescribes different verses from Song of Songs for different body parts, following a kabbalistic understanding that connects human anatomy to divine structures.

[iii]This verse from Isaiah 61:10 is recited during the tahara ritual after the washing is complete and when the deceased is being dressed in shrouds (tachrichim). The imagery of divine clothing creates a parallel between the physical dressing of the body and the spiritual garments that await the soul.

[iv]This powerful verse from Isaiah 26:19 about resurrection is included in the tahara ritual to emphasize that death is not the final state. The reference to 'dew of light' (טַל אוֹרוֹת) has particular kabbalistic significance, representing the divine emanation that will bring about resurrection.

Now therefore, if you will indeed obey My voice and keep My covenant, then you shall be a special treasure to Me above all peoples; for all the earth is Mine. And you shall be to Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation." These are the words which you shall speak to the children of Israel. And the LORD commanded us to observe all these statutes, to fear the LORD our God, for our good always, that He might preserve us alive, as it is to this day. But you who held fast to the LORD your God are alive, every one of you, today. I shall not die but live, and recount the deeds of the LORD.[1]

[1]This concluding verse powerfully affirms continued existence despite physical death. In the context of tahara, it suggests that the soul lives on and will eventually be reunited with the body at resurrection.

[i]This final verse from Psalm 118:17 serves as a powerful conclusion to the tahara ritual verses, affirming the Jewish belief in continued existence after death and eventual resurrection. The phrase 'I shall not die but live' is particularly significant in the context of washing and preparing the deceased.

[ii]Cf. Isaiah 4:4 — This verse from Isaiah is used in the tahara ritual (purification of the deceased) to create a parallel between the physical washing of the body and spiritual purification. The imagery of divine cleansing provides spiritual comfort and theological framework for the ritual. | Cf. Deuteronomy 33:21 — This verse, part of Moses' final blessing, is included for its themes of divine justice and leadership. In the context of the tahara ritual, it suggests the deceased has received their proper portion and has completed their role in executing divine justice. | Cf. Song of Songs 5:12 — This verse from Song of Songs is specifically used during the tahara ritual when washing the deceased's eyes. In Ma'avar Yabok, different verses from Song of Songs are recited for different body parts, creating a mystical connection between physical washing and spiritual purification. | Cf. Song of Songs 7:5 — This verse continues the pattern of using Song of Songs passages to sanctify the washing of different body parts during the tahara ritual. The poetic descriptions from Song of Songs elevate the physical washing into a sacred act. | Cf. Jeremiah 30:18 — This prophetic verse of restoration connects the ritual washing to themes of renewal and rebuilding. In the context of tahara, it suggests that death is not final destruction but part of a divine process that ultimately leads to restoration. | Cf. Isaiah 61:10 — This verse is recited during the tahara ritual after washing, when the deceased is dressed in shrouds. It creates a parallel between the physical dressing of the body and the spiritual garments of salvation that await the soul. | Cf. Isaiah 26:19 — This powerful verse about resurrection provides theological comfort during the tahara ritual. It affirms the Jewish belief in resurrection of the dead, suggesting that the current state of death is temporary. | Cf. Exodus 19:3-6 — These verses from Exodus remind participants in the tahara ritual of the covenant relationship between God and Israel. They affirm that the deceased, as part of Israel, remains in this covenant relationship even after death. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:24 — This verse emphasizes that observance of commandments, including proper burial rituals, is for the welfare of the community. In the context of tahara, it suggests that proper ritual observance benefits both the deceased and the living. | Cf. Deuteronomy 4:4 — This verse emphasizes the spiritual life that comes from attachment to God. In the tahara context, it suggests that though physically dead, the soul of one who was attached to God continues to live. | Cf. Psalm 118:17 — This verse expresses hope in continued existence despite death. It reflects the Jewish theological view that the soul continues after death and will ultimately be reunited with the body at resurrection.

For it is beautiful and pleasant to whisper with the sick person psalms arranged in alphabetical order, such as Psalm 34 (“Of David, when he changed his behavior”), Psalm 111 (“I will praise the Lord with my whole heart”), and Psalm 145 (“A praise of David”). In particular, Psalm 25 (“Unto You, O Lord, I lift up my soul”), which can be found above. Those attending should join with the sick person in focusing their intention on elevating through the collective power of their souls the components of nefesh (vital soul), ruach (spirit), and neshamah (higher soul) within him, according to the mystery of AI”K,[2] in which units correspond to neshamah, tens to ruach, and hundreds to nefesh, in accordance with the mystery of Kohen, Levi, and Israel,[3] as they said concerning the mystery of the [2]This passage reflects a view about the relative authority of different types of sacred texts, with the author suggesting that the Mishnaic sages themselves preferred to express their deepest insights through quotations from prophetic scripture rather than through their own formulations, despite the reverence their personal teachings received.

[1]The original uses two synonymous terms (‘metivta ila’ah’ and ‘derakia’) that both refer to the concept of heavenly academies where the souls of departed sages continue their Torah study after death. This notion appears frequently in rabbinic literature, particularly in mystical contexts.

[2]AI”K refers to a kabbalistic method of organizing the Hebrew alphabet into groups based on numerical values. This system is fundamental to many kabbalistic practices involving letter permutations and gematria (numerical equivalences).

[3]This refers to the traditional tripartite division of the Jewish people (priests, Levites, and Israelites), which the author correlates to the three levels of the soul. This creates a cosmic correspondence between social structure and spiritual reality.

[i]The author establishes a hierarchy of textual authority, with prophetic scripture ranking above rabbinic discourse, while still acknowledging the value of rabbinic teachings.

[ii]These terms refer to the celestial academy and heavenly yeshiva where, according to rabbinic tradition, the souls of departed sages continue their Torah study. This concept appears in several Talmudic and midrashic sources, notably in Bava Metzia 85b-86a.

[iii]This is a formulaic blessing phrase that echoes liturgical language used when concluding Torah readings, here repurposed to praise God’s choice of the sages and their teachings.

[iv]Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Bava Metzia 85b-86a — The author is contrasting the elevated status of prophetic scripture with the words of the sages, while still acknowledging that these sages’ teachings are valued in heavenly academies, alluding to the Talmudic concept that deceased scholars continue their studies in celestial academies. | Cf. Pirke Avot 6:3 — The concluding blessing formula in this passage echoes traditional rabbinic phrases of blessing God for choosing the sages and their teachings, specifically reminiscent of formulations found in Pirke Avot.

[v]This passage explains a kabbalistic technique for healing using psalms in alphabetical order. It employs a complex system where units (ones) correlate to neshamah (highest soul), tens to ruach (spirit), and hundreds to nefesh (vital soul), which parallel the three divisions of Jewish society: Kohen, Levi, and Israel. This system is connected to the daily requirement of reciting one hundred blessings.

one hundred blessings recited daily. The presence 4475R of ten individuals in any place nullifies calamity, as stated in Midrash Tanchuma regarding the verse “And Joseph’s brothers went down, ten of them,” with proof from Sodom, where it is written: “I will not destroy for the sake of the ten.” When 4480R alternative approach, they may direct their intention with the units toward elevating the nefesh, which is “their end is wedged in their beginning,”[1] as they that we included at the end of Minchat Aharon[2] are directed toward this purpose, although that was 4495R not our primary intention there. Anyone who truly

[1] This phrase ‘na’utz sofan b’techilatan’ comes from the Sefer Yetzirah, a foundational kabbalistic text, and refers to the cyclical nature of reality where the highest and lowest levels are interconnected. Here it’s applied to the relationship between the different soul components and divine attributes.

[2] Minchat Aharon is another work by the same author, Aaron Berechia of Modena. This self-reference helps establish the interconnection between his various works on related mystical practices.

[vi] The author cites rabbinic precedent for the power of ten individuals (a minyan) to nullify divine punishment, drawing on both the Midrash Tanchuma about Joseph’s brothers and the story of Sodom, where God agrees not to destroy the city if ten righteous people can be found.

[i] The text references several kabbalistic works including Pardes (likely Pardes Rimmonim by Moses Cordovero) and Ginat Egoz, directing readers to these sources for deeper understanding of the letter mysticism that underlies these healing practices. The author also mentions his own work Minchat Aharon, revealing how these texts form an interconnected body of kabbalistic literature.

[ii] Cf. Ma’avar Yabok, first discourse, section on visiting the sick — The passage connects to the broader theme in Ma’avar Yabok about proper spiritual care for the sick, specifically how to use psalms with kabbalistic intentions to elevate the soul of the ill person. | Cf. Minchat Aharon — The author explicitly references another of his own works, Minchat Aharon, which apparently contains alphabetically arranged verses that serve a similar purpose to what he’s describing here. | Cf. Pardes Rimmonim by Moses Cordovero — The author refers readers to Pardes Rimmonim (likely the work by Moses Cordovero) for deeper understanding of the mystical properties of Hebrew letters that underlie the practices described. | Cf. Sefer Ginat Egoz — The author refers readers to Sefer Ginat Egoz for further exploration of the mystical properties of Hebrew letters that underlie the practices described.

[1] The Hebrew term "sedarim" (סדרים) refers to the structured prayer sequences that make up a significant portion of Ma'avar Yabok. These are organized collections of psalms, biblical verses, and prayers designed for specific situations related to illness and approaching death.

[2] This transition indicates that the text is now moving from the previously presented prayer sequences to additional prayers specifically designed for recitation to or by the sick person.

[3] This opening declaration establishes a key theme relevant to Ma'avar Yabok's approach to illness and death: maintaining constant devotion to God regardless of circumstances. For the sick or dying person reciting this psalm, this verse becomes a spiritual commitment to maintain praise even through suffering.

[4] The sensory metaphor of 'tasting' divine goodness suggests direct spiritual experience rather than abstract knowledge. In kabbalistic contexts like Ma'avar Yabok, such metaphors would be understood as invitations to mystical perception, particularly relevant during transitional states like serious illness or approaching death when spiritual awareness may be heightened.

[i] Literally "what we have raised to the book," an idiomatic expression meaning "what we have written/recorded."

[ii] Refers to the previously recorded prayer sequences (sedarim) presented earlier in the text.

[iii] The phrase "to add instruction" (להוסיף לקח) has resonance with Proverbs 1:5, suggesting these additional prayers offer deeper wisdom or instruction.

[iv] Cf. Proverbs 1:5 — This subtle biblical allusion frames the additional prayers not merely as supplementary material but as deeper wisdom that builds upon the previous sections. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok's 'Seder' section — The phrase "liturgical orders that appear above" directly references the book's own structure, showing how these additional prayers are meant to supplement the formal sedarim already presented.

[1]The psalm concludes with divine redemption of the soul, a theme perfectly aligned with Ma'avar Yabok's central metaphor of 'crossing over' from life to death. This final verse would provide comfort that the soul's journey after death remains under divine protection and care.

[2]The Hebrew בְּכָל־לֵבָב literally means 'with all heart,' emphasizing complete devotion. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this whole-hearted praise represents the ideal spiritual state for one approaching death—fully aligned with divine will.

[3]The Hebrew דְּרוּשִׁים (derushim) implies not just casual interest but deep investigation or study. This suggests that proper appreciation of divine works requires active engagement, similar to how Ma'avar Yabok encourages active preparation for death rather than passive acceptance.

[i]Cf. I Samuel 21:10-15 — This psalm is identified as David's response to his deliverance from danger when he pretended to be insane before the Philistine king. In Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm is recommended for recitation by or for the sick, suggesting that just as David found divine deliverance in his distress, so might those facing illness or approaching death. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, First Discourse — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences reflects the belief that psalms expressing both distress and divine deliverance are particularly appropriate for those experiencing illness. The psalm's themes of divine protection, answered prayer, and deliverance from troubles resonate with the book's theological framework that proper spiritual preparation can facilitate healing or a peaceful transition at death. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Shabbat 30b — The psalm's emphasis on rejoicing in God and proclaiming His praise aligns with the rabbinic understanding that joyful devotion creates a connection to the divine presence. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this suggests that even in times of illness or approaching death, maintaining spiritual joy can facilitate divine presence and protection. | Cf. Zohar III:231a — The psalm's mention of 'The angel of the LORD encamps around those who fear Him' (verse 8) would be interpreted in Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework as referring to the protective spiritual forces that surround those who maintain proper spiritual devotion, particularly relevant for the sick and dying who might feel vulnerable to negative spiritual forces.

[ii]This psalm begins with a personal declaration of praise ('I will praise') but immediately places this individual devotion within the context of the community ('in the assembly of the upright and in the congregation'). This balance between personal and communal worship is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok, which addresses both the individual's spiritual preparation for death and the community's role in facilitating this transition.

He has given food to those who fear Him;[1] He will remember His covenant forever. He has shown His people the power of His works, by giving them the inheritance of the nations. The works of His hands are truth and justice; all His precepts are trustworthy. They are established forever and ever, done in truth and uprightness. He has sent redemption to His people; He has ordained His covenant forever; holy and awesome is His name. (Psalm 145) A Praise of David. I will exalt You, my God, the King, and I will bless Your name forever and ever. Every day I will bless You, and I will praise Your name forever and ever. Great is the LORD and highly praised, and His greatness is unfathomable. Generation to generation shall praise Your works, and they shall declare Your mighty acts.

[1] The Hebrew טֶרֶף (teref) literally means 'prey' or 'torn food,' but is used metaphorically for sustenance or provision. This vivid imagery of God as provider resonates with Ma'avar Yabok's theology that God provides spiritual sustenance through both life and the transition of death.

[2] The Hebrew construction לְכָל־עֹשֵׂיהֶם can be understood as either 'all who practice them' (referring to the precepts) or 'all who do His commandments.' I've chosen the first interpretation, but both convey the psalm's emphasis on active practice rather than mere intellectual acknowledgment—a theme that aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's practical guidance for end-of-life rituals.

[i] The phrase 'He has made His wonders to be remembered' carries special significance in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, as remembrance plays a crucial role in Jewish mourning practices. The psalm suggests that God's own actions establish a pattern of remembrance that the community then follows in commemorating both divine acts and departed souls.

[ii] The covenant relationship emphasized here would be particularly comforting to the dying person, as it affirms that God's commitment extends beyond the individual's lifetime. This provides reassurance that the soul remains in covenant relationship with God even after death.

[iii] This famous verse about the fear of God being the beginning of wisdom takes on deeper significance in the context of approaching death, when one faces the ultimate encounter with divine judgment. Ma'avar Yabok consistently presents proper spiritual preparation for death as the highest wisdom.

[iv] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — Psalm 111 appears in Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer sequences specifically for recitation by or for the sick. Its themes of divine faithfulness, covenant remembrance, and enduring righteousness provide spiritual comfort for those facing illness or approaching death. The psalm's emphasis on God's redemptive power and provision for those who fear Him makes it particularly appropriate in this context. | Cf. Book of Psalms — This is a complete quotation of Psalm 111, one of the acrostic psalms where each half-verse begins with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this psalm's themes of divine remembrance, covenant faithfulness, and enduring righteousness would be especially comforting to the sick or dying, assuring them of God's continued care. | Cf. Siddur (Jewish prayer book) — Psalm 111 is part of the liturgical recitation of Hallel on festivals and Rosh Chodesh. In Ma'avar Yabok, its inclusion in prayers for the sick connects the individual's experience to the communal celebration of divine deliverance, suggesting that even in illness, one remains part of the covenant community praising God.

[i] This verse contains part of the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy (שלש עשרה מדות של רחמים), which are invoked in various prayer contexts, particularly for divine forgiveness. Their appearance in this psalm connects it to themes of divine compassion that are central to Ma'avar Yabok's approach to death.

[ii] This verse about God supporting the fallen and straightening those who are bent has particular resonance in the context of illness and approaching death. Ma'avar Yabok presents it as a source of comfort for both the sick person who feels physically 'bent' by their condition and as reassurance that God will spiritually 'straighten' and support the soul in its journey after death.

[iii] The psalm's final verse, with its emphasis on continuing to praise God, connects to a theological theme throughout Ma'avar Yabok: that the living praise God in this world, and the righteous continue to praise Him in the World to Come. This creates a continuity between life and afterlife that is comforting in the context of approaching death.

[iv] Cf. Psalms — This psalm appears in Ma'avar Yabok's structured prayer sequences specifically designed for the sick and dying. Its themes of divine providence, sustenance, and universal care make it particularly appropriate for recitation during illness or approaching death. The alphabetic acrostic structure (missing only the letter 'nun') was believed to have special spiritual power. | Cf. Jewish Daily Prayer — Ma'avar Yabok's inclusion of this psalm reflects its traditional importance in Jewish liturgy, where it's seen as having special efficacy for opening the gates of paradise. The Talmud (Berakhot 4b) states that one who recites this psalm three times daily is assured of a place in the World to Come, making it especially appropriate for those approaching death. | Cf. Talmud — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgy for the sick and dying reflects the Talmudic teaching that reciting it guarantees one a place in the World to Come. This makes it particularly meaningful in the context of preparing the soul for its journey after death.

The meaning of plucking grass in the cemetery[1] is explained in Chapter 30, Discourse 2, and in Chapter 35, Discourse 5. There you will also find the meaning of ritual hand washing. Further, in Chapter 20, Discourse 3, you will find the order of the seven stations[2] and their significance. There it is written that one should first recite "May the pleasantness"[3] (Vihi Noam) as written above, up to "nor shall any plague come near your tent." And the word "For" at the beginning of the verse "For He will command His angels." Then one should sit in another place and recite "May the pleasantness" up to "For He will command His angels," and the third time up to "He will command His angels concerning you," and so on until "your ways," completing the entire psalm on the seventh recitation. After the seventh station, one should recite the blessing "You are mighty" etc., until "and faithful are You to revive the dead." [1]The term 'ma'aseh' (practical actions) in this context specifically refers to ritual practices surrounding death and burial that have halakhic significance and spiritual benefit.

[1]This refers to the Jewish custom of plucking grass and casting it over one's shoulder when leaving a cemetery, symbolizing the resurrection of the dead based on Psalm 72:16, 'They shall flourish like grass of the earth.'

[2]The Hebrew term 'sheva yoshvot' (seven sittings/stations) refers to a ritual practice where mourners stop seven times when leaving a cemetery, reciting portions of Psalm 91 at each station as a form of spiritual protection.

[3]This refers to Psalm 90:17, which begins 'Vihi Noam Adonai Eloheinu Aleinu' (May the pleasantness of the Lord our God be upon us). This verse is followed by Psalm 91, which is recited in portions during the seven stations ritual.

[i]The phrase 'moreh makom' (literally 'guide of place') is a technical term for an index or reference guide that points readers to where specific information can be found within a larger text.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This sentence serves as a transitional marker in the text, introducing a topical index or guide to the rituals and practices for the dying and deceased that have been discussed throughout Ma'avar Yabok. The author is essentially creating a reference tool to help readers locate specific practices within the larger work.

[iii]This refers to the Jewish custom of plucking grass at a cemetery and throwing it over one's shoulder when departing. It symbolizes resurrection based on Psalm 72:16, 'They shall flourish like grass of the earth.' The ritual serves as a prayer for the resurrection of the dead and as recognition of the cyclical nature of life.

[iv]The 'seven stations' (sheva yoshvot) is a ritual practice performed when leaving a cemetery. Mourners stop seven times, reciting progressively longer portions of Psalm 91 at each station. This practice symbolizes the soul's ascent through seven heavenly chambers and creates spiritual protection for both the deceased and the living.

ers, washing the mourner with water[4] and pouring it in a sloping place is explained in the aforementioned chapter and in Chapter 33 and Chapter 35, Discourse 2. If due to some preventing circumstance one cannot attend the funeral procession, one should at least pray for the deceased and recite two or three psalms or give charity for the atonement of his soul at the time of burial. And a living person who afflicts and mortifies himself to lessen the punishment of the dead certainly benefits that deceased person because of the relationship between souls.[1] See Chapter 21, Discourse 3. And for a wicked person who has died, it is good to pray for him and give charity for the atonement of his soul each month and at its end, even after twelve months, and the reason for this can be found there.

In Chapter 22 of Discourse 3, there is an important notice to those who benefit from charity funds and charitable collections: they are obligated to pray for the donors and for all holy communities. They should be very careful to use these funds only for their own sustenance and that of their household members. The same applies to priests who benefit from redemption of firstborns and similar offerings.

[4] This refers to the custom of washing hands after visiting a cemetery, which serves both as a purification ritual and as a symbolic separation between the realm of the dead and the realm of the living.

[1] Ma'avar Yabok presents a kabbalistic understanding of the interconnection between all Jewish souls, which allows for the transfer of spiritual merit between individuals, even across the boundary between life and death.

[i] This reflects the kabbalistic belief that self-affliction by the living can transfer merit to the deceased, reducing their spiritual suffering. This concept is based on the mystical understanding that all Jewish souls are interconnected, allowing for the transfer of spiritual merit between individuals, even across the boundary between life and death.

[ii] This passage challenges the common belief that prayers for the wicked are ineffective after death. Ma'avar Yabok teaches that even the souls of the wicked can benefit from prayers and charitable acts on their behalf, not just in the immediate aftermath of death but throughout the traditional twelve-month mourning period and even beyond it.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 30, Discourse 2 — This reference explains the kabbalistic significance of plucking grass at a cemetery, which is likely connected to the biblical verse 'They shall flourish like grass of the earth' (Psalm 72:16), symbolizing resurrection and the cyclical nature of life and death. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 20, Discourse 3 — This section details the ritual of the seven stations (sheva yoshvot) performed when leaving a cemetery, where mourners stop seven times while reciting specific portions of Psalm 91, representing the soul's ascent through seven heavenly chambers. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 21, Discourse 3 — This reference discusses the mystical connection between souls, explaining how actions performed by the living can benefit the dead due to the spiritual bonds that connect all Jewish souls across the boundaries of life and death. | Cf. Psalm 91 — Psalm 91 (known as 'Yoshev B'seter' or 'Shir Shel Pega'im') is considered to have special protective powers against harmful spiritual forces. The ritual of reciting it in seven segments when leaving a cemetery creates a spiritual shield for both the departed soul and the living visitors.

If they use these funds for Sabbath meals, festival meals, new moon celebrations, and similar occasions, this is commendable for them. Through this, they will merit that people will continue to give to them. All dealings of the living with the dead require great intention (kavvanah), as explained in Chapter 20 of Discourse 2, which also discusses the secret of carrying the deceased on the shoulder and the secret of burial in the "gi" (likely referring to a specific burial practice). 4645R 4650R

בפרק י״ט מאמר ג׳ מוכיח שבח וחיל כל בני חבורות קדושות גומלי חסדים להתנהג עצמם בתקונים הנזכרים בגמול חסד עם המתים וכ״ש אם הוא בעל תורה דלית שעורא לכבודו כדאמרי׳ במסכת מגילה ובכתובות:[iv] אין לחוש לומר דברים שבקדושה במקום המת כי לא אסרו אלא במקום הטנופת ומקום טנופת לחוד ומקום טומאה לחוד:[vi v]

Chapter 19 of the third discourse demonstrates the praise and valor of all members of sacred burial societies who perform acts of loving-kindness by conducting themselves according to the procedures mentioned for bestowing kindness upon the deceased. This is especially true if the deceased is a Torah scholar,[1] for whom there is no measure to the honor due to him, as stated in the tractates of Megillah and Ketubot. One need not be concerned about reciting sacred prayers in the presence of the dead,[2] for the prohibition applies only to places of filth, and a place of filth is distinct from a place of ritual impurity. 4655R 4660R 4665R

[1] The expression 'וכ״ש' (ve-kol she-ken) means 'all the more so' or 'especially' and introduces the heightened importance of following proper rituals when the deceased is a Torah scholar.

[2] The original uses the expression 'במקום המת' (in the place of the dead), which refers to the immediate vicinity of the deceased during burial preparations or funeral rituals.

[i] This is a central principle in Ma'avar Yabok—that all interactions between the living and the dead require not just physical action but proper spiritual intention (kavvanah). This reflects the book's kabbalistic perspective that ritual actions create effects in both physical and spiritual realms.

[ii] The reference to 'secrets' (sod) of carrying the dead and burial indicates mystical dimensions to these practices. The abbreviation 'בג״י' may refer to a specific burial practice, possibly related to the three-letter abbreviation representing burial with complete dignity.

[iii] Cf. Chapter 22 of Discourse 3 — The text references an earlier section of Ma'avar Yabok that contains detailed instructions about the obligations of those who receive charitable funds, particularly regarding their responsibility to pray for donors. | Cf. Chapter 20 of Discourse 2 — The text references another section of Ma'avar Yabok that discusses the mystical significance of funeral procedures, specifically carrying the deceased and burial practices. | Cf. Talmudic teachings on charitable distribution — The passage echoes rabbinic teachings about the responsibilities of those who manage or benefit from charitable funds, emphasizing both practical ethics and spiritual obligations.

[iv] The author references Talmudic sources (tractates Megillah and Ketubot) that discuss the special honor due to Torah scholars, even after death. These references reinforce the halakhic foundation for the burial practices described in Ma'avar Yabok.

[vi] Cf. Tractate Megillah — This reference strengthens the author's argument that Torah scholars deserve exceptional treatment in death rituals by appealing to a recognized rabbinic source | Cf. Tractate Ketubot — This reference provides additional rabbinic support for the author's claim about the immeasurable honor due to deceased Torah scholars

In Chapter 14 of Discourse 3, [it discusses] not speaking ill of the dead, and for the reason behind this, see Chapter 24 of Discourse 5. The reason for the status of onen [acute mourning before burial] and avelut [mourning], and why one is exempt from commandments [during these periods], and the order of comforting mourners, can be found in Chapters 34, 35, and 36 of Discourse 2. The reason for the three days of crying, seven days of eulogy, and thirty days of pressing [garments] can be found in Chapters 19 and 20 of Discourse 2. Additional information is in Chapter 36 of Discourse 5, where it also [states] that it is good for a mourner to recite many psalms, hashkavot [prayers for the repose of the soul], supplications, and to weep for their deceased, especially during the first three days. The verses and liturgical orders mentioned above are also intended for seeking mercy for the deceased throughout the twelve months [of mourning], as explained in Chapter 6 of Discourse 3 and Chapter 21 of Discourse 2, that it is good to pray for the deceased for thirty days in the place where they died, and likewise throughout the twelve months. Charity given on behalf of the dead atones for them, as does mentioning their souls. A great tikkun [spiritual rectification] that children perform for their parents is reciting sacred prayers in a minyan [prayer quorum]. The reason for the commandment regarding the dead mentioned in the Jerusalem Talmud is explained in Chapter 30 of Discourse 5. An example of pallbearers and gravediggers in the court of death is explained above in Chapter 16 of Discourse 3. One should intend during burial to bring the soul upward to the celestial grave and the neshamah into the mystery of the thirteen rivers of pure balsam, as explained in Chapter 18 of Discourse 3. It is good to be buried directly in the ground, even outside the Land of Israel, as [i] The prohibition against speaking ill of the dead (lashon hara) is taken very seriously in Jewish tradition. In Ma'avar Yabok, this prohibition is discussed within the broader context of how speech affects the souls of the departed.

[ii] Aninut refers to the acute mourning period between death and burial, while avelut is the formal mourning period that follows. During aninut, a mourner is exempt from positive commandments because they are considered completely preoccupied with arranging the burial.

[iii] These refer to traditional mourning periods in Jewish law: three days for intense weeping, seven days for eulogies (shiva), and thirty days during which pressed or laundered garments are avoided (shloshim). These periods reflect the gradual process of coming to terms with loss.

[iv] This kabbalistic concept refers to thirteen celestial rivers of pure balsam oil that are believed to purify and elevate the souls of the righteous after death. It appears in the Zohar and represents a realm of spiritual delight in the afterlife.

explained in Chapter 34 of Discourse 5. In Tractate Sotah, Chapter 4, attending a funeral is called "walking with God," based on the verse "and walk humbly with your God." In the Sabbath chapter "Rabbi Eliezer the Weaver," and in the Jerusalem Talmud, first chapter of Yoma, the obligation of eulogy is discussed. And in Chapter 13 of Tractate Sabbath, [is discussed] the obligation to weep for a worthy person. The sudden death of human beings demonstrates God's attachment to us through the soul—see about this in Chapter 12 of Discourse 2. Many laws concerning Tzidduk HaDin [Justification of Divine Judgment] are in Chapter 26 of Discourse 5. The mystical explanation of the blessing recited in a house of mourning can be found in Chapter 39 of Discourse 5. The reason for prayer in a house of mourning is in Chapter 34 of Discourse 5, where there is also a request to members of charitable societies that they arrange to bring one of these books there to seek mercy for the departed. It directs readers to specific chapters and discourses where they can find detailed explanations about different mourning customs, prayers for the deceased, and the mystical significance of funerary rituals. | Cf. Jerusalem Talmud — The passage references the Jerusalem Talmud's discussion of the obligation to deliver eulogies for the dead, which Ma'avar Yabok incorporates into its comprehensive treatment of Jewish mourning practices. | Cf. Tractate Sotah — The text references Tractate Sotah's characterization of funeral attendance as 'walking with God,' based on the verse from Micah 6:8 'walk humbly with your God,' establishing a theological framework that elevates funeral participation to an act of divine service. | Cf. Micah 6:8 — The biblical verse is cited as the source for understanding funeral attendance as 'walking with God,' establishing a scriptural basis for the religious obligation to participate in funeral rites.

[ii] The special emphasis on Sabbath soul commemoration reflects the kabbalistic belief that souls experience additional elevation and respite on the Sabbath day, making it a particularly powerful time for memorial prayers.

תפלה על הקבר[v] תוך שלשים

Prayer at the grave[4] during the first thirty days[5]

[1]The phrase 'כרצון איש ואיש' could be translated literally as 'according to the will of each man,' but I've rendered it more idiomatically as 'according to each person's wishes' to better capture the meaning in modern English.

[2]The original verse in Isaiah contrasts this future redemption with the exodus from Egypt, which was done 'in haste' (Exodus 12:11). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this becomes a metaphor for the soul's dignified transition from this world to the next.

[3]I've translated מאספכם as 'rear guard' to capture the military protection metaphor, though it also carries connotations of 'gathering in' or 'collecting,' which is spiritually significant in the context of death as God gathering the soul.

[4]This short title introduces a specific prayer meant to be recited when visiting a grave during the sheloshim (thirty-day mourning period). In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, such prayers serve both to comfort the soul of the deceased during its transition and to create a spiritual connection between the living and the dead.

[5]According to kabbalistic teachings in Ma'avar Yabok, the soul must ascend through thirty spiri-

[i]The author employs biblical language here, echoing passages about divine protection to reassure readers about the spiritual efficacy of the practices described in the book.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage references internal sections of Ma'avar Yabok itself, directing readers to Chapter 20 of the Third Discourse for further explanation about soul commemoration rituals. | Cf. Proverbs 3:23-24 — The phrase 'you will walk securely on your path' (ותלך לבטח דרכך) echoes Proverbs 3:23, 'Then you will walk on your way securely, and your foot will not stumble.' This biblical allusion reinforces the author's assurance that following the book's guidance provides spiritual security.

[iii]This is a direct quotation from Isaiah 52:12, which originally referred to Israel's redemption from exile. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, it takes on new meaning as a reassurance about the soul's journey after death.

[iv]The term מאספכם (your gatherer/rear guard) has dual significance—literally meaning one who gathers or collects, but in military contexts referring to the rear guard that protects an army from behind. In this context, it suggests God's complete protection of the soul's journey—led from the front and protected from behind.

[v]Cf. Isaiah 52:12 — In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse serves as a final prayer and blessing at the conclusion of a burial or memorial service. It metaphorically compares the soul's journey after death to Israel's redemption journey—not panicked or chaotic, but divinely guided and protected. The verse offers comfort by emphasizing that even in death, the departed soul is led forward by God and gathered in by the God of Israel. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 19 of the Third Discourse — The verse appears at the conclusion of funeral and memorial services described in Ma'avar Yabok, providing scriptural blessing for both the departed soul's journey and the mourners' return from the cemetery. It suggests that both the dead and living continue under divine protection.

[i]This is a specialized prayer to be recited when visiting a grave during the first thirty days after burial, a significant period in Jewish mourning customs when the soul is believed to be especially connected to its burial place.

tual levels (ten in each of the three lower worlds) before reaching the highest spiritual realm. This thirty-day period corresponds to this mystical journey, making graveside prayers during this time particularly significant.

[1]The Hebrew uses a metaphor of scales (מַכְרִיעוֹת) where merits tip the balance against obligations or sins, a common rabbinic image for divine judgment.

[2]The Hebrew 'עניתי בדרך כחי' describes the physical effort and difficulty of pilgrimage to a grave site, which was considered meritorious precisely because it involved sacrifice and exertion.

[3]The practice of prostrating at graves of the righteous (hishtate'ach) has deep roots in Jewish tradition, mentioned in both Talmudic and Kabbalistic sources. While some authorities discouraged excessive grave visitation, Ma'avar Yabok presents it as a legitimate practice when done with proper theological understanding and intention.

[4]The concept of merit (zechut) in Jewish theology involves the accumulated spiritual credit from

[ii]The first thirty days after burial (shloshim) is considered a distinct period in Jewish mourning practices. According to kabbalistic tradition mentioned elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok, during this time the soul is still adjusting to its separation from the body and is particularly responsive to prayers offered at the graveside.

[iii]Cf. Memory note #1036 — This memory note connects to a key concept likely invoked in this prayer, where the soul is described as being 'bound in the bond of life' after death. | Cf. Memory note #2344 — This reference helps explain why prayers during the first thirty days are considered particularly effective—they address the soul's journey through different spiritual realms during this specific timeframe. | Cf. Memory note #1579 — This explains the spiritual significance of the thirty-day period mentioned in the prayer title and why graveside prayers during this time would be considered especially effective in aiding the soul's ascent.

[iv]The expression 'subdue my inclination' refers to the rabbinic concept of the yetzer hara (evil inclination) that must be controlled and redirected toward divine service. This reflects the Jewish understanding that human nature contains both constructive and destructive impulses that require conscious management.

[v]The phrase 'with a perfect heart' (בְּלֵבָב שָׁלֵם) appears frequently in biblical texts, particularly in reference to King David and other righteous figures who served God wholeheartedly. It conveys complete devotion without division or hesitation.

[vi]Cf. Psalm 86:11 — The prayer draws on Psalm 86:11's plea for God to unify one's heart in divine service, adapting it to request subduing of one's evil inclination. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:5 — The phrase echoes the commandment to love God 'with all your heart,' showing the prayer's grounding in biblical language of devotion. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 1, Chapter 16 — This prayer appears to be part of Ma'avar Yabok's instructions for cemetery visits, particularly within the first thirty days after death, as described in the work's first discourse.

[A] Or: "until the coming of the Messiah" — In Jewish eschatology, 'the Redeemer' (HaGoel) often specifically refers to the Messiah. This alternative makes the messianic reference more explicit for readers unfamiliar with Jewish terminology.

This alternative translation more explicitly conveys the resurrection concept that is central to the prayer.

[1] The four-part description of Torah engagement (meditating, observing, engaging, and understanding) reflects a progressive deepening of religious commitment, from basic study to penetrating the mystical dimensions of divine wisdom.

[i] Cf. Daniel 12:13 — The citation of this verse emphasizes the Jewish belief in bodily resurrection, connecting the individual being prayed for with the biblical promise of the righteous rising to their appointed destiny in the messianic era. | Cf. Isaiah 26:19 — The prayer uses this verse to reinforce the concept of bodily resurrection, framing the grave visit as a temporary situation that will eventually give way to the revival of the dead when the righteous will literally rise from their graves. | Cf. Isaiah 35:1-2 — In the context of this prayer, these verses serve as a metaphor for resurrection and renewal. Just as desolate land can be transformed into flourishing gardens, so too will the dead be transformed and brought back to life in the messianic era. | Cf. Isaiah 42:11 — The prayer employs this verse to evoke the joyous celebration that will accompany the resurrection of the dead, when even those confined to remote places (metaphorically, the grave) will

[A] Or: "A prayer derived from the sayings of the Tannaim and Amoraim" — This alternate translation emphasizes the derivative nature of the prayer, suggesting that it may be compiled or adapted from various teachings rather than being a direct quote from a specific sage.

[2] The prayer concludes with three biblical quotations about resurrection and renewal, moving from individual resurrection (Daniel and Isaiah 26) to cosmic transformation (Isaiah 35), creating a powerful crescendo of hope for both personal and universal redemption.

[1] This opening line sets a tone of joyful reverence rather than mournful lamentation, reflecting the Jewish mystical view that the righteous dead exist in a state of spiritual glory. The Hebrew term 'חסידים' (pious ones) could refer both to the righteous deceased and to those who visit their graves with proper devotion.

[2] The Hebrew 'תתעטף ברחמיך' uses the imagery of God wrapping Himself in mercy as one would wrap oneself in a prayer shawl (tallit), suggesting that divine mercy should completely envelop and characterize God's approach to the supplicant.

[3] The term 'אומנותנו' (omanutenu) literally means 'our craft' or 'our occupation,' suggesting that Torah study should be central to one's life, like a professional craft or primary occupation, not merely an occasional activity.

join in praise. | Cf. Tehillat Rashbi (Zoharic literature) — The prayer's emphasis on understanding the 'depths of Your mysteries' (b'imkei sodecha) reflects kabbalistic aspirations to penetrate the deeper mystical dimensions of Torah, suggesting that the author of Ma'avar Yabok was influenced by and drawing upon the mystical tradition.

[i] This phrase identifies the source of the prayer as the teachings of the early rabbinic sages. The Tannaim were the rabbinic authorities whose views are recorded in the Mishnah (approximately 10-220 CE), while the Amoraim were the rabbinic sages whose discussions are recorded in the Gemara (approximately 220-500 CE).

[ii] This is a direct quote from Psalm 149:5. The verse continues with 'ירננו על משכבותם' ('let them sing for joy on their couches/beds'). In the context of a prayer recited at a grave, this line takes on added significance, suggesting that the righteous dead rejoice in their glory in the afterlife.

[iii] Cf. Psalm 149:5 — This verse from Psalms is used here as an opening line for a prayer collection attributed to the early rabbinic sages. The selection is appropriate for a prayer to be recited at a grave since it speaks of the righteous rejoicing in glory, suggesting the elevated spiritual state of the deceased in the afterlife. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — Within the structure of Ma'avar Yabok, this prayer appears in a section containing prayers for cemetery visits. It connects to the book's broader theme that the righteous dead continue their spiritual existence in a state of glory, and establishes that the following prayer text derives its authority from the early rabbinic tradition.

[iv] The imagery of a 'crown of light' (keter orah) has kabbalistic significance, representing the divine illumination that comes from spiritual enlightenment and Torah study. This contrasts with the 'corner of darkness' (keren chashekha) that follows, symbolizing spiritual confusion and moral failure.

[i] The concept of Torah as one's 'craft' or 'occupation' (omanut) reflects the Talmudic ideal that Torah study should be one's primary focus in life, not merely an occasional activity. This phrase appears in rabbinic literature describing scholars whose Torah study was their exclusive occupation.

[1]The Hebrew 'בעל דין קשה' literally refers to a difficult opponent in a legal dispute, but in the context of this prayer, it has broader implications of any challenging confrontation or spiritual adversary.

[2]The complete prayer continues: '...guard my tongue from evil and my lips from speaking deceit. To those who curse me, let my soul be silent; let my soul be like dust to all. Open my heart to Your Torah, and may my soul pursue Your commandments. As for all who plan evil against me, quickly nullify their counsel and frustrate their plans. Act for the sake of Your Name; act for the sake of Your right hand; act for the sake of Your holiness; act for the sake of Your Torah. That Your beloved ones may be delivered, save with Your right hand and answer me.' This prayer is attributed to Mar son of Ravina in the Talmud (Berakhot 17a) and is recited as a personal supplication at the end of the Amidah.

[3]This standard opening for Jewish prayers (Yehi Ratzon) directly addresses God, asking for divine assistance in maintaining scholarly integrity and proper judgment.

[4]The reciprocal nature of this prayer reflects the importance of maintaining harmonious relationships within scholarly communities, especially when dealing with the sensitive matters of illness, death, and mourning that are the focus of Ma'avar Yabok.

[ii]The prayer concludes with requests for protection from various negative external influences, reflecting the Jewish understanding that one's spiritual state is affected by both internal character traits and external social environments.

[iii]Cf. Talmudic prayer tradition — This prayer draws on traditional Talmudic formulations, particularly the morning prayers where one asks to be saved from various spiritual and social dangers. The structure and phrasing closely resemble portions of the daily Amidah prayer, while its requests for protection from negative character traits reflect the ethical emphasis found throughout rabbinic literature. | Cf. Psalm 36:10 — The phrase 'crown of light' (כתר אורה) evokes the biblical verse 'In Your light we see light' (באורך נראה אור), creating a connection between divine illumination and spiritual enlightenment. This metaphor of light versus darkness permeates biblical and rabbinic literature as representing wisdom versus ignorance, righteousness versus sin. | Cf. Ethics of the Fathers 5:20 — The phrase 'Let Your Torah be our craft' (תהיה תורתך אומנותנו) alludes to the rabbinic ideal of Torah study as one's primary occupation, as expressed in Pirkei Avot: 'Make your Torah fixed/permanent' (עשה תורתך קבע). This reflects the Jewish value of placing Torah study at the center of one's life.

[iv]This is the opening of a well-known prayer (Elohai Netzor) traditionally recited at the conclusion of the Amidah prayer. The 'וכו" (etc.) indicates that only the opening words are provided, with the assumption that the reader knows the full prayer.

[v]Cf. Talmud Berakhot 17a — This reference in Ma'avar Yabok suggests that Elohai Netzor was considered an appropriate prayer to recite at a gravesite, possibly because of its themes of spiritual protection and divine guidance.

[vi]This prayer reflects the rabbinic concern about scholarly disputes becoming personal and contentious rather than being conducted 'for the sake of Heaven.' In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which addresses end-of-life situations, maintaining collegial relationships would be especially important when making difficult decisions about ritual practices.

[1]The prayer concludes with concerns about erroneous lenient rulings, balancing the earlier concern about excessive strictness. In Jewish legal tradition, both types of errors are problematic, though in different ways: unnecessary strictness can cause suffering while inappropriate leniency can lead to transgression.

[2]The Hebrew phrase "וְיִהְיוּ דְבָרֵינוּ תַּחֲנוּנִים לְפָנֶיךָ" could also be translated as "may our words be received as entreaties before You," emphasizing not just the nature of the speech but its reception by God.

[3]The Hebrew "וְתַעֲשֶׂה עִמָּנוּ צְדָקָה לְמַעַן שְׁמֶךָ" literally means "do righteousness/charity with us for the sake of Your name." This combines the concepts of justice and mercy, suggesting divine favor beyond what might be strictly deserved.

[i]The four potential errors mentioned—declaring the pure impure, the impure pure, forbidding the permitted, and permitting the forbidden—represent the comprehensive range of halakhic mistakes a scholar might make. The prayer thus seeks divine assistance in avoiding both unnecessary stringency and inappropriate leniency.

[ii]Cf. Berakhot 28b — The prayer reflects the scholar's anxiety about making halakhic errors in judgment or becoming entangled in disputes with colleagues. It appears in Ma'avar Yabok's section on proper spiritual attitudes for scholars, emphasizing the importance of humility and collegiality in religious leadership, especially when dealing with matters of life and death. | Cf. Ethics of the Fathers (Pirkei Avot) 1:11 — This prayer reflects the rabbinic concern about making erroneous rulings that might lead others astray. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, which deals with end-of-life rituals, the consequences of error are particularly grave, making this prayer especially apt.

[iii]The pairing of "hatred" (שנאה) and "jealousy" (קנאה) appears frequently in rabbinic literature as destructive emotional forces that prevent spiritual growth and proper religious devotion.

[iv]This phrase directly echoes Psalm 51:12, a penitential prayer attributed to King David after his sin with Bathsheba, suggesting this prayer is particularly appropriate in contexts of repentance and spiritual renewal.

[v]Cf. Psalm 51:12 — The phrase "Create a pure heart within us" (וְלֵב טָהוֹר תִּבְרָא בְקִרְבֵּנוּ) directly echoes Psalm 51:12 "Create in me a pure heart, O God" (לֵב טָהוֹר בְּרָא־לִי אֱלֹהִים), a penitential psalm attributed to King David. This reference frames the prayer as one of spiritual purification and renewal. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:5 — The phrase "May our hearts be unified in reverence of Your name" (וְיִתְיַחֵד לְבָבֵנוּ לְיִרְאָה אֶת שְׁמֶךָ) echoes the Shema prayer based on Deuteronomy 6:5, especially its emphasis on serving God with a unified heart. This reference connects this prayer to the central Jewish affirmation of faith. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This prayer appears in a collection of prayers from the Tannaim and Amoraim (early rabbinic sages) included in Ma'avar Yabok. The style and structure parallel other prayers in the work that emphasize spiritual purification and preparation, especially those related to maintaining pure intention in religious study and practice.

[A] Or: "a humble soul and a lowly spirit" — The terms נֶפֶשׁ (nefesh) and רוּחַ (ruach) are technical terms in Jewish mysticism referring to different levels of the soul. While my original translation conveys the intended meaning, this alternate preserves the technical distinction between these soul-aspects, which may be relevant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok's kabbalistic framework.

[B] Or: "and make us not a topic of conversation among creatures" — This more literal translation of הַבְּרִיּוֹת as "creatures" rather than "people" preserves the broader scope of the term, which can include all created beings. However, the idiom typically refers to human gossip, so the original translation better captures the intended meaning.

[1] This rhythmic pattern of seven 'goods' follows a classic rabbinic formula, but expands upon it. In Jewish ethical literature, each of these qualities has specific meaning: a 'good heart' refers to generosity of spirit, a 'good eye' means being non-jealous and satisfied with what one has, a 'good inclination' refers to the yetzer hatov (the positive spiritual impulse), etc.

[2] The Hebrew phrase 'מַתְּנַת בָּשָׂר וָדָם' (gifts of flesh and blood) is a rabbinic idiom referring to human charity or assistance. The prayer expresses the desire for self-sufficiency and dignity, reflecting the Jewish value of independence while acknowledging ultimate dependence on God.

[3] This reference to avoiding shame before ancestors in the World to Come (עוֹלָם הַבָּא) reflects the Jewish belief in accountability after death and the continuity between generations. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, a manual for end-of-life practices, this phrase takes on added significance as the reader contemplates their own eventual crossing to the next world.

[i] This prayer begins with a series of positive attributes using the word 'good' (טוֹב) repeatedly, creating a rhythmic pattern of seven 'goods.' This reflects the rabbinic style of Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai's blessing to his disciples in Pirkei Avot, but expanded to include additional qualities.

[ii] The concern about being dependent on human charity (literally 'gifts of flesh and blood') reflects both practical worries about dignity in old age or illness, and a spiritual emphasis on dependence on God alone. This prayer appears in several rabbinic sources, including Rabbi Nechunya ben HaKanah's prayer when entering the study hall.

[iii] This concluding phrase reflects the Jewish concept that generations are spiritually connected and will reunite in the World to Come. The fear of shame before one's ancestors serves as a powerful motivation for ethical behavior and spiritual preparation in this life.

[iv] Cf. Ethics of the Fathers (Pirkei Avot) 2:9 — The prayer adopts and expands upon this classic rabbinic blessing, showing how Ma'avar Yabok incorporates traditional ethical teachings into its approach to spiritual preparation for death. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Berachot 28b — The prayer echoes Rabbi Nechunya's petition not to be dependent on human charity, suggesting that spiritual preparation for death includes cultivating independence and dignity. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Fourth Discourse — This prayer appears to be part of the Tannaitic and Amoraic material integrated into Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequences, providing ethical guidance for those contemplating mortality.

[i] This formulaic opening 'May it be Your will, LORD our God and God of our fathers' is standard in Jewish petitionary prayers, connecting individual requests to the covenant relationship established with the patriarchs.

[A] Or: "The yeast in the dough" — The term refers to the evil inclination metaphorically as yeast or leaven that causes dough to rise or swell with pride. Both translations are accurate, but 'yeast' might be more immediately understood by modern readers.

[B] Or: "and humble it" — The Hebrew root כנע carries connotations of humbling or bringing low, not just subduing. 'Humble it' might better capture the spiritual dimension of this request.

[C] Or: "May we rejoice in our share in Paradise" — While 'Garden of Eden' is the literal translation, 'Paradise' is often used in English religious contexts to refer to the same concept and might resonate better with some readers.

[D] Or: "May we arise early and discover what our hearts yearn for" — The phrase יְחוּל לִבֵּנוּ can be interpreted as the yearning or waiting of our hearts, not just anticipation. This alternate translation captures the emotional quality of longing that might be present in the original.

[E] Or: "and scour away our iniquities" — The Hebrew מרק carries a sense of scouring or thoroughly cleansing, which is stronger than simple cleansing. This alternate translation better captures the intensity of the purification being requested.

[1] This is a direct translation of a talmudic expression referring to the evil inclination. The metaphor compares the evil inclination to leaven/yeast that causes dough to swell, representing how evil desires inflate within a person.

[2] This sequence of four positive qualities (love, brotherhood, peace, and friendship) follows a pattern common in rabbinic blessings, creating a comprehensive description of ideal human relationships that stand in contrast to the divisiveness caused by the evil inclination.

[1] This qualification reflects an important theological nuance: while traditional Jewish thought recognizes suffering as potentially atoning, this prayer specifically requests atonement through divine mercy rather than through painful experiences—particularly relevant in a text focused on care for the ill and dying.

[i] A rabbinic metaphor for the evil inclination (yetzer hara), comparing it to leaven or yeast that causes dough to rise—suggesting how pride and evil desires can inflate within a person and cause spiritual corruption.

May my prayer be pure before the Dweller on High, to benefit me and my offspring and my offspring's offspring in this world, with length of days and years of life and peace, and in the World to [2]The Hebrew phrase uses a construction that implies turning backward or retreating from God's presence, suggesting not merely sinning but actively distancing oneself from the divine relationship.

[3]This unusual metaphorical description of the Tannaim and Amoraim reflects kabbalistic concepts about how these rabbinic sages embody divine attributes within the cosmic structure. The arms and thighs represent strength and support in the divine realm.

[i]This specific request for cleansing 'not through suffering and evil illnesses' represents an important theological position in Jewish thought that acknowledges suffering can be atoning but expresses the preference for divine mercy over painful purification.
[ii]Cf. Talmud Berakhot 17a — This prayer's inclusion in Ma'avar Yabok demonstrates how the author incorporates traditional rabbinic prayers into his work on death and dying, suggesting that preparing for death involves the same spiritual struggles addressed in daily prayer—particularly overcoming the evil inclination. | Cf. Talmud Berakhot 17b — The author draws from established rabbinic prayer formulations, placing preparation for death within the context of traditional Jewish spiritual practice rather than creating entirely new liturgical forms. | Cf. Genesis Rabbah 34:10 — By using this established rabbinic metaphor, the prayer connects the spiritual preparation for death with the lifelong struggle against the evil inclination, suggesting that conquering this inclination is a crucial part of preparing for the afterlife. | Cf. Daily Amidah Prayer — By using this familiar prayer structure, the author places preparation for death within the framework of daily Jewish prayer, suggesting that the spiritual work of preparing for death is an extension of regular spiritual practice. | Cf. Yom Kippur Confessional Prayers — By incorporating language from Yom Kippur confessions, the prayer draws a parallel between the Day of Atonement and preparation for death, suggesting that approaching death requires similar spiritual cleansing and forgiveness.
[iii]The term 'chilutz atzamot' (literally 'extraction of bones') idiomatically refers to physical vigor and health, drawing on imagery from Isaiah 58:11 where God promises to 'invigorate your bones.'
[iv]This passage uses technical kabbalistic terminology, describing the Tannaim and Amoraim (early rabbinic sages) as 'arms and thighs from the side of holiness.' This metaphor portrays them as embodiments of divine attributes within the cosmic structure, representing strength and support in the divine realm.
[i]The phrase 'eitan moshavam' (their dwelling is mighty/firm) may allude to Balaam's prophecy in Numbers 24:21 regarding the Kenites whose 'dwelling is strong' (eitan moshavecha), reapplied here to describe the eternal spiritual stature of the sages.

[1]These terms (‘ahavah rabbah’ and ‘ahavah zuta’) are technical kabbalistic concepts referring to different levels or types of divine love and unification in the spiritual realms.

[2]This phrase translates ‘tzachtzachot,’ which appears in Isaiah 58:11. While literally referring to ‘parched places,’ in this mystical context it describes spiritual illumination and divine satisfaction in the afterlife.

[3]This draws on imagery from Psalm 36:8-9 about being satisfied with the abundance of God’s house, adapting it to describe the soul’s nourishment in the afterlife.

[4]This formulaic conclusion is a traditional litany of appeals to different aspects of divine authority and attributes, commonly found in Jewish liturgical prayers seeking divine intervention.

[ii]The terms ‘ahavah rabbah’ (great love) and ‘ahavah zuta’ (lesser love) are kabbalistic concepts describing different modes or intensities of divine love and unification. In Lurianic Kabbalah, they represent different types of spiritual unions between divine aspects.

[iii]The term ‘tzachtzachot’ comes from Isaiah 58:11, where God promises to satisfy the soul in ‘parched places’ or with ‘clear radiance.’ In kabbalistic interpretation, this represents spiritual nourishment in the highest realms.

[iv]Cf. Psalm 90:10-17 — The prayer draws on traditional biblical language about longevity as a divine blessing | Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Berakhot 16b-17a — This prayer directly quotes or closely parallels the personal supplication attributed to Rav in the Talmud, showing how Ma’avar Yabok integrates traditional rabbinic texts into its liturgy for the sick and dying | Cf. Zohar III:29b — The kabbalistic terminology about souls being bound in the ‘bond of life’ and enjoying the ‘supernal Garden of Eden’ reflects Zoharic teachings about the afterlife | Cf. Psalm 36:8-9 — The prayer adapts this psalm’s imagery of divine abundance to describe the soul’s nourishment in the afterlife | Cf. Isaiah 58:11 — The phrases ‘be satisfied with clear radiance’ and ‘may his bones be invigorated’ directly echo Isaiah’s prophetic language about divine blessing

[i]Ferrara was an important center of Jewish life and learning in Renaissance Italy. The city’s Jewish community flourished particularly in the 16th century after Jews were expelled from the Iberian Peninsula. This attribution indicates that Rabbi Aaron Berechia was collecting prayers from various Italian Jewish communities and incorporating them into his work.

[ii]Cf. Ma’avar Yabok — This prayer appears to be part of the collection of cemetery prayers in Ma’avar Yabok. The designation of Ferrara as its origin connects it to the Italian Jewish community where Rabbi Aaron Berechia of Modena was active, showing how the author incorporated regional liturgical traditions into his work. | Cf. Peace be upon you, our teachers and our masters.[1] May your souls be bound in the bond of life with the LORD our God. Peace be upon you, and upon your resting places may there be peace in your repose. Fortunate are you who merited to walk in the ways of our Creator. You are destined for the life of the World to Come. You dwell among the holy angels in the company of the most exalted ones.[A] May the LORD hasten your resurrection and accelerate your rising,[B] and may He grant us merit to see your faces shining and radiant like the brightness of the firmament.[2] May your merit and your integrity stand for us, and may your Torah protect us.

(And if it is a time of war, he should add and say:[3] At this time when we are in great distress and immense danger from the sound of the battle cry which we hear with our ears, and our eyes see troops gathering and weapons of war being assembled in these regions, battle line facing battle line.)

May peace come and rest upon your resting place, and may you also, like us, increase prayer on our behalf. Entreat the LORD our God that for the sake of His abundant mercies and His great kindnesses, and for the sake of the merit of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, our holy forefathers, and the merit of all the righteous who have done His will, He may have compassion, and show mercy, and protect us and our wives and our children and our infants, and the [A] Or: "among the elevated souls" — The term 'bnei aliyah' literally means 'children of ascent' and is a rabbinic term for spiritually elevated individuals. This alternate translation is more literal while still conveying the concept of spiritual elevation.

[B] Or: "and hasten your standing [at resurrection]" — The term 'amidatkhem' refers specifically to standing up, which in this context is a reference to resurrection. This alternate translation makes the resurrection imagery more explicit.

[1] This prayer belongs to a category of cemetery prayers in Ma'avar Yabok that address the deceased directly rather than speaking about them in the third person. This reflects the Jewish belief that the souls of the departed remain conscious and can hear the words of the living.

[2] This is an allusion to Daniel 12:3, which describes how 'the wise shall shine like the brightness of the firmament' in the messianic age. The prayer thus connects the current state of the righteous dead with their future glorification at the resurrection.

[3] This conditional addition demonstrates how Ma'avar Yabok's prayers were designed to be adaptable to different historical circumstances. The 17th century, when this work was composed, was marked by significant wars and conflicts affecting Jewish communities in Europe.

formulation of a Hashkavah (soul repose) prayer developed in the Ferrara Jewish community. Such prayers were recited at gravesites to provide comfort to the soul of the deceased.

[iii] This prayer follows the Jewish tradition of directly addressing the deceased, reflecting the belief that the souls of the departed remain aware and can intercede for the living.

[iv] The repetition of 'hasten' and 'accelerate' regarding resurrection creates a poetic emphasis typical of Hebrew prayer. The term 'amidah' (standing) is a euphemism for resurrection of the dead.

crying, with tears upon our cheeks, kneeling and confessing our sins, seeking forgiveness and atonement and help for us in this time of trouble like today.[2]

[A] Or: "spoil or pillage" — These are biblical terms for property taken as war booty. This alternate translation uses different English synonyms that might better convey the biblical language.

[1] The Hebrew uses the idiom 'ya'alem ozno' (turn away His ear), a biblical expression found in Lamentations 3:56 and Psalm 55:2. This anthropomorphic language describes God as actively choosing whether to listen to human prayers.

[2] The prayer concludes with a transition from addressing the dead to a communal confession of the living, creating a spiritual bridge between the two worlds. This reflects the book's central theme of crossing over (ma'avar) between life and death.

[i] The concept of covenant (brit) is central to Jewish theology. This prayer invokes God's covenantal promises as the basis for divine protection, particularly in times of danger.

[ii] The prayer shifts from addressing the deceased to describing the living community's posture of repentance, creating a spiritual connection between the worlds of the living and the dead through shared devotion.

[iii] Cf. 1 Samuel 25:29 — This biblical reference is foundational to Jewish concepts of the afterlife. In this prayer at the grave, it expresses the belief that the souls of the righteous continue to exist in close proximity to God after death. The phrase appears in traditional Jewish memorial prayers and on tombstones. | Cf. Daniel 12:3 — This reference connects the deceased to the 'wise ones' mentioned in the Book of Daniel who will shine brightly in the messianic age. It suggests that the righteous dead are already experiencing a foretaste of the messianic redemption, while also looking forward to bodily resurrection. | Cf. Leviticus 26:44 — This biblical passage is particularly significant in times of communal danger. The prayer invokes this divine promise of preservation as a basis for requesting divine protection in the present crisis. It reflects the Jewish theological understanding that God's covenant with Israel remains eternally valid despite historical circumstances. | Cf. Leviticus 26:45 — This passage reinforces the appeal to God's covenant faithfulness, specifically referencing the foundational event of the Exodus. By invoking this text, the prayer connects the current community's situation to the historic pattern of divine redemption, suggesting that just as God rescued Israel from Egypt, He can provide deliverance from current dangers.

[A] Or: "for the dispersed ones of Judah and Israel" — The term galut can refer to both the state of exile and to the exiled people themselves. This alternate translation emphasizes the people in exile rather than the condition of exile.

[B] Or: "for all of us like sheep have gone astray" — This alternate more directly echoes the famous phrasing from Isaiah 53:6, which is likely being deliberately invoked in this prayer. The biblical allusion might be more recognizable to readers with this phrasing.

[1] This tripartite description of God comes from Deuteronomy 10:17 and was incorporated into the standard Jewish liturgy. The prayer is opening with a traditional formulation that would be immediately recognizable to Jewish worshippers.

[2] This reference to exile (galut) is a central theme in Jewish theological understanding of history, interpreting dispersion as divine punishment for covenant unfaithfulness rather than merely political circumstances.

[3] The prayer reflects the theological framework of Ma'avar Yabok that suffering is not random misfortune but divinely ordained as correction for spiritual failings, connecting present troubles directly to religious shortcomings.

[i] The term ma'al (unfaithfulness/trespass) has specific connotations in biblical Hebrew of breach of trust, especially in a covenantal relationship. It's stronger than ordinary sin, suggesting betrayal of God's trust.

[ii] The concept of Torah lishmah (Torah study for its own sake, without ulterior motives) is a fundamental principle in rabbinic Judaism. The confession here acknowledges failing to maintain this pure intention in Torah study.

[i] Cf. Daniel 9:4-19 — This prayer in Ma'avar Yabok is deliberately structured after Daniel's confession, creating a direct connection between the biblical exile and the contemporary exile experience of the Jewish community. By using this biblical model, the author positions current suffering within a historical pattern of sin, confession, and hoped-for redemption. | Cf. Daily Amidah prayer — The prayer draws on familiar liturgical patterns, particularly from penitential prayers, creating a sense of continuity between standard daily worship and the special circumstances of mourning or illness that would prompt the use of Ma'avar Yabok.

May it be Your will that no sin or iniquity impede our prayer. And now, O LORD our God, look down and behold our affliction.[A] For we are in great distress[1]—we, our wives, our children, our little ones, and our infants.[B] Please increase Your kindness toward us and save us from the plague of the sword and from death (God forbid[C]), from plunder and captivity, and from all damage and distress. Have pity and compassion upon us, upon our infants, and upon our little ones, and remove all harm and all distress from us. Act now, O LORD our God, act without delay for the sake of Your great and holy Name that is called upon us.[2] Do not abandon us, and do not hide Your face from us, for we are in distress—answer us quickly. May the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable before You, O LORD, my Rock and my Redeemer.

[A] Or: "please gaze upon and see our suffering" — The Hebrew uses two visual verbs ('habeṭ' and 'u-re'eh') with the particle 'na' indicating entreaty. While 'look down and behold' captures the sense well, 'please gaze upon and see' might better preserve both the dual visual imagery and the entreating nature of 'na'.

[B] Or: "our children and our babes" — The Hebrew terms 'tap' and 'olalim' both refer to young children of different ages. The distinction between 'little ones' and 'infants' captures this, but 'children and babes' is another valid translation that preserves the poetic parallelism.

[C] Or: "heaven forbid" — The Aramaic phrase 'bar minan' (literally 'external to us') is an euphemistic way of referring to something negative without directly stating it. 'Heaven forbid' is another common English rendering that preserves the euphemistic nature of the expression.

[1] This prayer appears to have been composed for times of community crisis or persecution, referencing threats of violence, plunder, and captivity that were historical realities for many Jewish communities throughout history.

[2] This phrase invokes God's intervention not primarily based on human merit but on God's own reputation and covenant relationship with Israel. The concept that God's name is 'called upon' the Jewish people derives from biblical passages like Deuteronomy 28:10.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase literally means "external to us" and is a euphemistic way to say "God forbid" or "may it not happen to us." It is commonly used when mentioning death or other calamities to ward off their occurrence.

[iii] This phrase refers to the concept that the Jewish people bear God's name, making them both protected by and responsible to God. The appeal to God's name is a common motif in Jewish prayer, based on the idea that God will act to preserve the honor of His name.

[i] Cf. Psalms 19:15 — The prayer concludes with this direct quotation from Psalms 19:15, a verse commonly used to end prayers in Jewish liturgy. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse serves as a formal closure to the supplication, expressing hope that both the articulated words and the unspoken thoughts of the heart will be accepted by God. | Cf. Lamentations 5:1 — This phrase echoes Lamentations 5:1 ('Remember, O LORD, what has befallen us; look, and see our disgrace'). In Ma'avar Yabok, this allusion to Lamentations connects the present suffering to the biblical paradigm of national calamity, suggesting that individual affliction is part of a larger pattern of divine-human interaction where looking to God for salvation is the appropriate response. | Cf. Daniel 9:19 — This phrasing echoes Daniel 9:19's urgent appeal: 'O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, pay attention and act. Delay not, for your own sake.' In Ma'avar Yabok, this reference frames the prayer as part of the traditional Jewish understanding of pleading with God in times of crisis, emphasizing both the urgency of the situation and God's sovereignty.

Rabbi Elazar said: In the future, the righteous will be addressed as "holy" in the same way[1] that one addresses the Holy One, blessed be He, as it is said (Isaiah 4:3): "And it shall be that he who remains in Zion and he who is left in Jerusalem will be called holy—everyone who is recorded among the living in Jerusalem." [A] Or: "When taking leave of the houses of the living" — This is a more literal translation of 'batei chayyim' (houses of the living), which is a Hebrew euphemism for cemetery. The euphemism reflects the Jewish belief in the continuation of life after death and would preserve the original text's reverent tone.

[B] Or: "The righteous are destined to be called by the name of the Holy One, blessed be He" — The Hebrew 'עֲתִידִים' can be translated as either 'in the future' or 'are destined to,' with the latter capturing more of the sense of divine determination in the original.

[1] The Hebrew term 'kadosh' (holy) is one of the most significant divine attributes in Jewish tradition. The Kedushah prayer, recited daily, proclaims God as 'Holy, Holy, Holy' (based on Isaiah 6:3). Rabbi Elazar's teaching that this term will be applied to the righteous represents an extraordinary elevation of human potential.

[ii] The text uses the euphemistic term 'batei chayyim' (houses of life) rather than 'beit kevarot' (house of graves) or 'beit olam' (house of eternity), reflecting the Jewish theological position that death is not the end of existence but a transition to another form of life. This section introduces prayers to be recited when leaving a cemetery.

[iii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 20, Third Discourse — This instruction refers back to rituals discussed earlier in Ma'avar Yabok about proper behavior when leaving a cemetery. The departure rituals were considered important to maintain separation between the realms of the living and the dead, while still honoring the deceased. | Cf. Talmud Berakhot 58b — The Talmudic tradition prescribes specific prayers when departing from a cemetery, including affirmations of future resurrection and divine justice. This instruction aligns with that tradition, though Ma'avar Yabok expands these practices with additional kabbalistic elements.

[iv] This citation formula ("X said in the name of Y") is typical of Talmudic literature, indicating the transmission chain of the teaching. Rabbah bar bar Chanah was a third-century Babylonian sage known for his remarkable stories, while Rabbi Yochanan was one of the greatest Palestinian Amoraim (Talmudic sages) of the same period.

[v] This verse from Isaiah 43:7 is reinterpreted here in a novel way. While in its original context it refers to the people of Israel collectively being called by God's name, Rabbi Yochanan applies it to individual righteous people who will attain such spiritual elevation that they will bear God's name.

[i] The term 'holy' (kadosh) is one of the primary attributes used to describe God in Jewish liturgy, particularly in the Kedushah prayer where the angels proclaim 'Holy, holy, holy is the LORD of hosts.' Rabbi Elazar's statement suggests that the righteous will share in this divine attribute to such an extent that they will be addressed with the same title.

[ii] Cf. Babylonian Talmud, Bava Batra 75b — This passage serves to emphasize the exalted status that the righteous will attain in the messianic future. By being called by God's name and addressed as 'holy,' they will share in divine attributes. This reflects the Jewish theological concept that

It is good to make a habit of praying this prayer at the grave[B] in the singular form[1] when a person visits his deceased,[2] as ruled by Rabbi Joseph Karo in Yoreh De'ah at the end of section 344.[C] This should be done during the year of mourning, especially during the first thirty days. Each time, before requesting mercy for oneself or for the living people of Israel in the place of those who dwell in the dust,[iii] it is good to first recite this prayer and afterward ask 5000R 5005R

[A] Or: "And all who seek refuge in You will rejoice; forever they will sing joyously, and You will spread Your protection over them" — This alternative more explicitly conveys the image of divine protection implied by 'וְתָסֵךְ עָלֵימוֹ' (which has connotations of covering or shielding) while maintaining the poetic structure of the verse.

[B] Or: "It is beneficial to regularly recite this prayer at the gravesite" — This alternate translation might be preferable in contexts that emphasize the functional benefits of the practice rather than its moral goodness. It also uses 'regularly recite' instead of 'make a habit of praying' for a more formal tone.

[C] Or: "in accordance with the ruling of Rabbi Joseph Karo in Yoreh De'ah, section 344" — This alternate translation removes the potentially confusing 'at the end of' phrasing and uses the more formal 'in accordance with' to emphasize the halakhic authority being cited.

[1] The original text specifies 'בלשון יחיד' (in singular language), meaning the prayer should be addressed directly to the individual deceased person being visited, rather than using plural forms that might apply to all the dead.

[2] The phrase 'מבקר אדם את מתו' literally means 'when a person visits his dead one,' referring to visiting the grave of a relative or loved one. This reflects Jewish custom of maintaining connection with the deceased through grave visitation.

human beings can attain a level of spiritual perfection that brings them into closer alignment with divine qualities. | Cf. Isaiah 43:7 — Rabbi Yochanan reinterprets this verse, which originally referred to Israel as a nation, to suggest that the righteous will individually bear God's name in the future world. This exemplifies the rabbinic method of applying scriptural verses beyond their original context to teach new theological concepts. | Cf. Isaiah 4:3 — Rabbi Elazar uses this verse to demonstrate that the righteous will be addressed as 'holy,' a title usually reserved for God. This interpretation elevates human potential to an extraordinary degree, suggesting that through righteousness, humans can attain a status approaching the divine. | Cf. Psalm 5:12 — This verse is added as supporting evidence for the special relationship between God and the righteous. It emphasizes both the protection God provides ('וְתָסֵךְ עָלֵימוֹ'—You will shelter them) and the spiritual joy experienced by those who love God's name, reinforcing the connection between righteous humans and divine qualities. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — The inclusion of this passage in Ma'avar Yabok's cemetery departure prayers serves to comfort mourners by emphasizing the exalted status that the righteous dead will attain in the World to Come. It transforms the sorrow of death into hope for the spiritual elevation of the deceased, reassuring the living that their departed loved ones will achieve an extraordinary closeness to God.

[i] This refers to Rabbi Joseph Karo (1488-1575), the author of the Shulchan Aruch, the most authoritative code of Jewish law. The citation establishes halakhic authority for the practice being described.

[ii] This refers to section 344 of Yoreh De'ah, part of the Shulchan Aruch that deals with laws of mourning and grave visitation. The numerical value of the Hebrew letters מש״ד equals 344.

[iii] A euphemistic reference to the dead as 'dwellers in the dust,' based on biblical language. This phrase connects to the book's theme of respectful language when discussing death.

[A] Or: "Great and good peace from the Benevolent Master" — This alternative captures the Aramaic quality of the phrase, which uses 'shalam' (שְׁלָם) rather than the Hebrew 'shalom' (שָׁלוֹם). The term 'Ribon Tav' could also be rendered as 'Benevolent Master' to maintain the poetic repetition of 'tav' (good) in the original.

[B] Or: "those who rest in the earth" — This alternative avoids the potentially negative connotation of 'dust' and emphasizes the peaceful resting state of the deceased. It's less literal but might better convey the respectful tone of addressing the dead in a cemetery prayer context.

[1] The original text ends with this introduction to the prayer that would follow, but the prayer itself is not included in this passage. In the original text of Ma'avar Yabok, the full prayer would appear next.

[2] This direct address to the deceased with honorific titles reflects the Jewish belief that the righteous dead maintain awareness and can intercede for the living. It shows continuity of relationship despite death and demonstrates profound respect for their continuing spiritual influence.

[3] The Hebrew begins with the first-person singular imperfect verb 'I will call,' establishing this as a personal prayer of commitment rather than an imperative or communal declaration.

[iv] Cf. Yoreh De'ah — The text references the halakhic code Yoreh De'ah compiled by Rabbi Joseph Karo, specifically citing his ruling about proper practices when visiting graves. This establishes the legal foundation for the prayer practice being described. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This passage appears in Ma'avar Yabok as part of the practical prayer instructions for visiting graves. It represents the book's broader purpose of providing detailed ritual guidance for those performing acts of kindness for the deceased.

[v] This opening phrase is in Aramaic rather than Hebrew, as evidenced by the use of 'shalam' (שְׁלָם) instead of the Hebrew 'shalom' (שָׁלוֹם) for 'peace.' Aramaic was commonly used in Jewish funerary contexts and prayers for the dead, possibly to distinguish these prayers from everyday Hebrew liturgy and to connect with the language of the Kaddish prayer.

[vi] This euphemism for the dead ('dwellers in the dust') connects to biblical passages about resurrection, particularly Daniel 12:2 which refers to 'those who sleep in the dust of the earth.' This phrase acknowledges death while subtly affirming the Jewish belief in eventual resurrection.

[vii] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, prayer for visiting graves — This opening line appears to be part of a cemetery prayer from Ma'avar Yabok used when visiting graves. It addresses the deceased in respectful Aramaic terms, acknowledging them as teachers and rabbis. The phrase follows the traditional Jewish practice of addressing the deceased directly during cemetery visits, showing that the boundary between living and dead is permeable through prayer. | Cf. Daniel 12:2 — The phrase 'dwellers in the dust' (שׁוֹכְנֵי עָפָר) echoes Daniel 12:2's reference to 'those who sleep in the dust of the earth' (מִיְּשֵׁנֵי אַדְמַת-עָפָר), connecting this cemetery prayer to biblical passages about resurrection. This subtly communicates that the deceased are not permanently gone but temporarily dwelling in the earth awaiting future revival. | Cf. Talmud, Berakhot 18a-b — The direct address to the dead as 'our teachers and our rabbis' reflects the Talmudic concept that the righteous dead remain conscious of and can intercede for the living. Berakhot 18a-b discusses whether the dead are aware of worldly affairs, and this prayer presupposes such awareness by directly addressing them with honorific titles.

[i] The divine name 'God Most High' (Elohim Elyon) appears frequently in cemetery prayers, emphasizing God's transcendent power over both life and death.

[ii] This phrase comes from Psalm 57:3 where it expresses confidence in God completing His purpose for the psalmist despite dangers. In the context of cemetery prayers, it takes on added significance as an affirmation of God's ongoing purpose that extends beyond death.

[C]Or: "to the God who completes [what concerns] me" — This more literal translation preserves the ambiguity of the Hebrew, which could refer to God completing or perfecting matters related to the individual.

[A]Or: "for the living and for the dead" — The preposition 'עִם' could be interpreted as 'for' or 'on behalf of' in this context, suggesting God's kindness being extended toward both living and dead rather than necessarily accompanying them.

[B]Or: "O God of Being, God Eternal, LORD" — This alternative provides more accessible English equivalents that convey the theological meaning of these divine names rather than transliterating them. This might be preferable in contexts where readers are less familiar with Hebrew divine names and their mystical significance.

[C]Or: "may they continually move in the presence of the living" — This alternative captures the

[1]This unusual metaphor for a cemetery (חצר מוות) suggests a transitional space rather than a final destination, aligning with the book's central metaphor of 'crossing over' from one state to another.

[iii]This extension to the original psalm verse is significant, as it explicitly connects divine care to both the living and the dead, reinforcing Ma'avar Yabok's central theme that God's loving-kindness transcends the boundary between life and death.

[iv]Cf. Psalm 57:2-3 — In Ma'avar Yabok, these verses are repurposed for cemetery prayers, extending their meaning to include God's protection not only for the living but also for the dead. This adaptation reflects the book's central theme of divine care extending beyond death. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok prayer formulas — The prayer exemplifies how Ma'avar Yabok adapts biblical verses into liturgical formulas that create a theological framework connecting the living and the dead under God's protection and care.

[v]The prayer begins with three divine names that appear in ascending order of manifestation in Kabbalistic thought: Ehyeh (the name God revealed to Moses at the burning bush, representing pure becoming), Yah (a contracted form of the Tetragrammaton used in liturgy), and YHVH (represented here by its pronunciation substitute). This combination would be understood as invoking God's mercy from multiple divine dimensions simultaneously.

[vi]The cemetery is described as a 'courtyard of death,' reflecting the kabbalistic understanding that burial grounds are not merely endpoints but transitional spaces—courtyards leading to other realms where the soul begins its journey after leaving the body.

[i]This phrase, derived from 1 Samuel 25:29, became the standard expression in Jewish tradition for describing the afterlife state of the righteous. Literally 'bound in the bundle of life,' it suggests souls being gathered together and preserved in God's special treasury. This phrase appears on many Jewish tombstones to this day.

[ii]Cf. Psalm 36:10 — This prayer draws on the biblical phrase from Psalms to connect God as the source of both physical and spiritual life. In the context of a cemetery prayer, it affirms that even the deceased remain connected to this divine source. | Cf. 1 Samuel 25:29 — This classic phrase from Samuel has become the central metaphor in Jewish tradition for the soul's continued existence after death. It expresses the hope that the departed souls remain connected to the divine source of eternal life. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 4 — This phrase reflects Ma'avar Yabok's understanding of the cemetery as a liminal space between worlds—not merely a place of endings but a courtyard or transitional area where souls begin their journey to the next realm. | Cf. Divine Names: Ehyeh, Yah, YHVH — The prayer begins with three divine names that represent different aspects of God's manifestation. This triple invocation is characteristic of kabbalistic prayers that seek to draw upon multiple divine attributes simultaneously.

continuous aspect of the Hebrew verb form and clarifies that the text is referring to an ongoing spiritual presence rather than a physical walking. It might be preferred in contexts where the metaphorical nature of the phrase needs to be emphasized.

[A]Or: "The gracious God, in the abundance of His loving-kindness and compassion," — This alternate translation is more literal in rendering the preposition 'כְּרוֹב' as 'in the abundance of' rather than 'according to.' It also translates 'רַחֲמָיו' as 'compassion' which might better capture the nuance of the Hebrew term related to womb-like mercy.

[B]Or: "May you be counted among all His faithful ones in His presence," — The Hebrew 'לְעוּמָתוֹ' literally means 'opposite to Him' or 'corresponding to Him,' which in this context implies being positioned in relation to God. The alternate translation captures the idea of being counted among the faithful in God's presence, which may better reflect the spiritual state being described.

[1]This traditional phrase (צרור החיים) has become the standard Jewish expression for the afterlife state of the righteous, appearing on countless tombstones with the Hebrew abbreviation ה.ב.צ.נ.ת (May his/her soul be bound in the bond of life).

[2]The Hebrew construction 'מִלְּפָנָיו מִשְׁפָּטֵכֶם יֵצֵא' literally means 'from before Him may your judgment go forth,' emphasizing that divine judgment originates directly from God's presence. This reflects the Jewish belief that souls are judged by God after death.

[3]In biblical Hebrew, 'to walk before God' is an idiom expressing living in accordance with divine will and enjoying divine favor. In this cemetery prayer context, this phrase has been transformed from its original meaning of living righteously in this world to describing the soul's existence in the afterlife.

[iii]This opening phrase invokes God specifically in His aspect of grace and mercy, appropriate for a cemetery prayer seeking divine compassion for the deceased. The Hebrew term 'רַחֲמָיו' (His mercy) derives from 'רֶחֶם' (womb), suggesting a maternal, nurturing quality to divine compassion.

[iv]This reflects the Jewish belief that souls face divine judgment after death. The phrase 'מִלְּפָנָיו' (from before Him) emphasizes that judgment comes directly from God's presence, suggesting its ultimate authority and fairness.

[i]The Hebrew plural 'lands of the living' rather than singular 'land' suggests multiple realms or dimensions of afterlife existence, possibly reflecting kabbalistic concepts of different spiritual worlds that the soul traverses after death.

[ii]Cf. Psalm 116:9 — The phrase 'lands of the living' in this prayer echoes Psalm 116:9, transforming what was originally a statement about walking before God in this life into a hope for the deceased to walk before God in the afterlife. This subtly reframes the biblical verse from describing earthly existence to describing a post-mortem spiritual existence. | Cf. Deuteronomy 30:15 — The conclusion of this prayer echoes Deuteronomy's pairing of 'good' and 'life,' but transforms what was originally presented as a choice in this world into an eternal state in the afterlife. This suggests that the deceased have now entered a realm where they perpetually experience the 'good and life' that they chose during their earthly existence. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Cemetery Prayer section — This prayer is part of a larger collection of cemetery prayers in Ma'avar Yabok that consistently use biblical allusions to reframe the deceased's state from one of death to one of continued spiritual existence. The prayer employs conventional biblical phrases about walking before God and experiencing divine judgment, but applies them to the deceased's postmortem experience.

[iv] :הַטּוֹב וְהַחַיִּים walk before goodness and life.[C]

4740 אֱלֹהִים חַיִּים [i]יִזְכּוֹר יִזְכּוֹר
אֶתְכֶם בְּטוֹב וּבְרַחֲמִים וְיַגִּיהַּ

4745 [iv iii]הַטּוֹב וְהַחַיִּים:

May the Living God[A] surely remember you[B 1] for good and with mercy, and may He cause your light to shine,[C] and fulfill in you the vision of His word:[D] "My covenant was with him, life and peace,"[2] and may you always walk before goodness and life. 5035R

[C]Or: "And may you perpetually journey in the presence of the Good and the Living One." — This alternate interpretation reads 'הַטּוֹב וְהַחַיִּים' not as abstract concepts (goodness and life) but as divine epithets referring to God as 'the Good' and 'the Living One.' This reading is plausible in the context of a prayer addressing the deceased's relationship with God in the afterlife, though it's less literal than the original translation.

[A]Or: "God of Life" — The phrase can be translated either way, with 'Living God' being more common in English liturgical language, while 'God of Life' emphasizes God as the source of life rather than as a living entity.

[B]Or: "remember, may He remember you" — The doubling of the verb root (zakor yizkor) creates emphasis in Hebrew. My original translation captures this through 'surely,' but the alternate translation preserves the repetitive structure of the original Hebrew.

[C]Or: "brighten your light" — The verb 'yagiha' comes from a root meaning to shine/brighten. The alternate translation is more concise while the original translation more explicitly indicates divine causation.

[D]Or: "and establish in you the vision of His utterance" — The terms 'yeqayem' (establish/fulfill) and 'ma'amaro' (His word/utterance) have multiple possible translations. The alternate translation uses more formal theological language.

[1]The Hebrew uses a doubled verb construction 'zachor yizkor' (literally 'remember, He will remember'), which is a grammatical form used for emphasis. I've translated this emphatic construction using 'surely' to convey the intensity of the original.

[2]This phrase is quoted from Malachi 2:5, where it refers to God's covenant with the priestly tribe of Levi. In the context of this cemetery prayer, it suggests that the deceased now shares in the special relationship of peace and life that characterized the priestly covenant.

[iii]The phrase 'Elohim Chayim' (Living God) appears frequently in cemetery prayers, emphasizing God's eternal nature in contrast to human mortality. This creates a theological framework where death is not an end but a transition into God's eternal presence.

[iv]This is a direct quotation from Malachi 2:5, referring to God's covenant with Levi. By invoking this priestly covenant in a cemetery prayer, the text creates a connection between the deceased and the divine service of the priests, suggesting that death is itself a form of sacred service.

[i]The Hebrew verb 'tithalchu' (you shall walk) shares the same root as 'halicha' (walking), which in Jewish mystical thought represents the soul's ongoing journey even after death. This phrase reflects the central metaphor of Ma'avar Yabok: death as a crossing or journey rather than an endpoint.

[ii]Cf. Malachi 2:5 — The cemetery prayer invokes God's covenant with Levi as a paradigm for the divine promises of life and peace that extend to the deceased. This reference connects the deceased to the priestly lineage and divine service. | Cf. Psalm 56:14 — The concluding phrase "may you always walk before goodness and life" echoes Psalm 56:14's "that I may walk before God in the light of life." This allusion transforms the biblical verse into a prayer for the deceased's soul to continue a spiritual journey in the divine presence. | Cf. Burial Kaddish — While not quoting the Kaddish directly, this cemetery prayer shares its structure of invoking divine attributes followed by expressions of hope for the deceased, reflecting the Jewish liturgical pattern of comfort prayers at graves.

[iii]This opening combines the Tetragrammaton with a reference to God as the deity of the patriarchs, establishing the prayer's connection to ancestral tradition and covenant.

eternal life.[C]

[E] Or: "The LORD, God of the patriarchs of old" — This alternate translation emphasizes the biblical patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob) rather than the more literal 'fathers of the world.' This might be preferable in contexts where the theological connection to the biblical patriarchs is more relevant than the chronological reference.

[A] Or: "in heavenly yeshivas and sanctuaries of refuge" — This alternate translation uses the more specific term 'yeshivas' for 'מְתִיבוֹת' (which specifically refers to rabbinic academies in the afterlife according to rabbinic literature) and renders 'מִשְׁכָּנוֹת מַבְטָחִים' with more spiritual connotations. This might be preferable in contexts emphasizing the mystical aspects of the afterlife.

[B] Or: "And may the celestial High Priest present your essence as a sweet offering" — This alternative emphasizes the metaphorical nature of the High Priest in this context, as the prayer refers to the afterlife where there is no literal Temple service. The 'pleasing fragrance' is rendered as 'essence' to convey that it represents the spiritual essence of the deceased rather than a literal fragrance.

[C] Or: "May you rest in peace and stand up at the resurrection of the dead" — This alternate translation more explicitly references the Jewish belief in bodily resurrection ('stand up' rather than 'arise') and uses the traditional phrase 'resurrection of the dead' rather than the more poetic 'end of days to eternal life.' This might be preferable in contexts where doctrinal clarity is prioritized over poetic expression.

[1] The original uses the Aramaic 'שְׁמַיָּא' for 'heaven' rather than the Hebrew 'שָׁמַיִם,' reflecting the influence of Aramaic in Jewish liturgical and mystical texts, particularly those dealing with the afterlife.

[2] I've translated 'מְתִיבוֹת' as 'academies' rather than the more specific 'yeshivas' to maintain accessibility while still conveying the concept of centers of Torah study in the afterlife. The phrase 'מִשְׁכָּנוֹת מַבְטָחִים' echoes Isaiah 32:18 and refers to heavenly abodes of peace and security.

[iv] This description of God glorifying Himself with strength and might echoes liturgical language from the daily prayers, particularly the Yishtabach blessing.

[v] The term 'מְתִיבוֹת' specifically refers to heavenly academies where souls continue studying Torah after death according to rabbinic tradition, while 'מִשְׁכָּנוֹת מַבְטָחִים' (secure dwelling places) evokes Isaiah 32:18.

[vi] This metaphor draws on Temple sacrifice language, comparing the acceptance of the deceased's soul to the High Priest's offering of sacrifices that were received with divine favor. The 'High Priest' here may refer metaphorically to the archangel Michael, who according to some rabbinic traditions serves as a celestial High Priest.

[i] This conclusion echoes Daniel 12:13, expressing the Jewish belief in bodily resurrection at the end of days. The paired verbs 'rest' and 'arise' encapsulate the Jewish understanding of death as a temporary sleep followed by awakening in the messianic era.

[ii] Cf. Song of Songs 4:11 — This reference frames the deceased as a pleasing offering to God, suggesting that their soul is being received favorably in heaven, much like sacrifices were accepted in the Temple. | Cf. Leviticus 1:9 — By employing Temple sacrifice terminology, the prayer creates a parallel between the acceptance of the deceased's soul in heaven and the acceptance of sacrifices in the Temple, implying that death itself serves as a form of atonement. | Cf. Daniel 12:13 — By echoing Daniel's prophecy about resurrection, the prayer affirms the Jewish belief in bodily resurrection and frames death as a temporary sleep from which the righteous will awaken in the messianic era. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Berakhot 17a — This cemetery prayer follows a similar structure to rabbinic afterlife prayers found in the Talmud, emphasizing continued Torah study in heavenly academies (מְתִיבוֹת) and divine acceptance, reflecting the rabbinic conception of paradise as a place of continued spiritual growth rather than mere repose.

May the LORD of Hosts and God of Hosts have mercy upon you. May He walk with you[D] in both the lower and upper Garden of Eden after the ascent of each of your souls from the Cave of Machpelah to the Cherubim.[1] From there, God will shepherd you, and there you shall live and delight, and you shall stand above and ascend on high from one New Moon to another and from one Sabbath to another to bow down before the King, the LORD of Hosts,[2] and may you merit to stand at the end of days.[A][3]

שַׁדַּי מֶלֶךְ רַחֲמָן[iv] יִפְקֹד אֶתְכֶם

Shaddai, the merciful King,[4] will remember you for [A] Or: "May He stroll with you" — The Hebrew 'yitayel' has connotations of a leisurely stroll or promenade rather than just walking. This alternate translation captures the sense of divine companionship in a more relaxed, intimate setting.

[B] Or: "the culmination of life" — While 'end of days' is the standard eschatological rendering, 'the culmination of life' might better capture the positive connotation of this phrase as the ultimate fulfillment of existence rather than simply its endpoint.

[1] This depicts a mystical geography of the afterlife, where souls travel from earthly burial sites (represented by the Cave of Machpelah where the Patriarchs are buried) to celestial realms (represented by the Cherubim who guard divine presence).

[2] This describes the ongoing spiritual activity of souls in the afterlife, specifically their participation in celestial worship ceremonies that mirror earthly liturgical cycles marked by the New Moon and Sabbath.

[3] This refers to the Jewish belief in bodily resurrection (techiyat ha-metim) at the end of days. The prayer expresses hope that the deceased will merit resurrection when the Messiah comes.

[4] The divine name Shaddai (שַׁדַּי) is traditionally associated with God's attribute of sufficient power and providence. In this context, it's paired with "merciful King" to emphasize the compassionate aspect of divine judgment in the afterlife.

[i] Shaddai (one of God's names meaning "Almighty") is here portrayed as a merciful king, consistent with the kabbalistic understanding of divine attributes combining power and compassion.

[ii] This reflects the kabbalistic concept that souls continue to ascend through spiritual levels even after death, achieving progressively higher states of divine communion.

[iii] In kabbalistic thought, the Cave of Machpelah (the burial site of the biblical Patriarchs and Matriarchs) functions as a mystical waystation for souls, from which they ascend to higher spiritual realms represented by the Cherubim.

[iv] Cf. Isaiah 66:23 — This is a direct quote from Isaiah 66:23, which describes the regular worship of God in the messianic era. In Ma'avar Yabok, this verse is applied to the souls of the deceased, suggesting they will participate in celestial worship according to the divine calendar, just as described in Isaiah's vision of the end times. | Cf. Cave of Machpelah — The Cave of Machpelah is the burial site of the biblical Patriarchs and Matriarchs (Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebecca, Jacob, and Leah). In kabbalistic thought, it represents both a physical burial place and a mystical waystation for souls. The reference suggests that souls first gather at this ancestral burial ground before ascending higher through the spiritual realms. | Cf. Zohar — The prayer's structure and imagery reflect concepts from the Zohar, particularly regarding the soul's posthumous journey through various celestial realms. The Zohar describes souls ascending from lower to higher levels in the afterlife, with righteous souls continuing to ascend on Sabbaths and New Moons to receive additional divine illumination. | Cf. Garden of Eden — In kabbalistic cosmology, the Garden of Eden is divided into lower and upper realms. The lower Garden of Eden (Gan Eden Tachton) is where souls first arrive after death, while the upper Garden of Eden (Gan Eden Elyon) is a higher spiritual realm reserved for the most spiritually accomplished souls. This prayer envisions the deceased ascending through both levels.

And after the opening of the gates of the Sanctuary by Michael,[1] the souls that have united[2] will be brought to enter into the innermost sanctum by the Great Prince, and they will offer a sacrifice before God.[3] The Redeeming Angel will accompany them to the gates of Aravot,[4] and there you will merit pleasantness until the end of days.[5] 5060R

אֲדֹנָי מֶלֶךְ עוֹלָם[x] יְזַכֶּה נַפְשׁוֹת The Lord, King of the universe,[6] shall merit all your 5065R

[1]This reflects the Jewish mystical belief that Michael serves as the high priest in the celestial Temple, paralleling the role of the high priest in the earthly Temple who would enter the Holy of Holies.

[2]The Hebrew 'שֶׁנִּתְאַחֲדוּ' implies not just a gathering of souls but their unification in spiritual harmony, a state considered necessary for higher ascent in the afterlife journey.

[3]This is not a literal animal sacrifice but a metaphorical offering of the soul's essence and devotion, representing the culmination of the soul's spiritual service.

[4]Aravot (עֲרָבוֹת) is the highest of seven heavens in rabbinic and kabbalistic cosmology, where God's throne of glory, justice, and righteousness resides. This represents the ultimate destination in the soul's posthumous journey.

[5]The 'pleasantness' (נְעִימוֹת) refers to spiritual delight in the divine presence, and 'the end of days' (קֵץ הַחַיִּים) indicates this state continues until resurrection, when souls will return to renewed bodies.

[6]The Hebrew text begins with the divine name 'Adonai' followed by 'melech olam' (King of the universe/eternal King), establishing God's sovereignty over all realms, including the afterlife.

[i]In Jewish mystical tradition, the archangel Michael serves as the heavenly high priest who opens the gates of the celestial Temple for souls to enter after death.

[ii]This refers to souls that have achieved a state of unification or harmony, considered a prerequisite for entering higher spiritual realms.

[iii]The "innermost sanctum" parallels the Holy of Holies in the earthly Temple but refers here to the most sacred celestial realm where souls come into direct divine presence.

[iv]"The Great Prince" likely refers to the archangel Michael, who in Jewish tradition is considered the guardian of Israel and the high priest of the heavenly Temple.

[v]This metaphorically describes souls offering themselves as sacrifices before God, representing complete spiritual devotion and self-nullification in the divine presence.

[vi]"The Redeeming Angel" appears in Genesis 48:16 where Jacob blesses his grandchildren. In mystical contexts, it represents a specific angelic force that guides and protects souls in their afterlife journey.

[vii]Aravot is the seventh and highest heaven in Jewish mystical cosmology, considered the dwelling place of God's glory, divine presence, and throne.

[viii]"The end of days" refers to the messianic era and resurrection of the dead, indicating that the souls will remain in this pleasant state until the ultimate redemption and resurrection.

[ix]Cf. Genesis 48:16 — The text echoes Jacob's invocation of 'the angel who has redeemed me from all harm' (הַמַּלְאָךְ הַגֹּאֵל אֹתִי מִכָּל־רָע), applying it to the soul's posthumous journey. This creates a connection between ancestral blessing and afterlife protection. | Cf. Zohar, Parashat Pekudei — The text draws on the Zohar's elaborate descriptions of the celestial realms, particularly Aravot as the seventh heaven where righteous souls experience divine pleasure. The entire passage presents a condensed version of the soul's ascent through heavenly palaces as described in Zoharic literature. | Cf. Talmud Bavli, Hagigah 12b — The reference to Aravot as a celestial realm draws on the Talmud's description of the seven heavens, where Aravot is described as the highest heaven containing righteousness, justice, and God's throne of glory. | Cf. Isaiah 57:2 — The passage's emphasis on souls meriting pleasantness echoes Isaiah's description of peace for the righteous: 'He shall enter into peace; they shall rest in their beds, each one walking in his uprightness.' However, Ma'avar Yabok extends this concept with a more elaborate celestial journey.

[x]This opening employs the divine name Adonai (Lord) alongside the title 'King of the universe,' establishing the prayer's focus on God's sovereignty over both the living and the dead.

[A] Or: "shall grant merit to all your souls" — This alternate translation more clearly expresses the causative aspect of the Hebrew verb 'yezakeh,' emphasizing that God is actively bestowing merit rather than the souls earning it themselves. This might be preferable in contexts where theological precision about divine agency is important.

[B] Or: "Garden of Eden" — While 'Garden of Delights' is a literal translation of 'Gan Adanim,' the term is commonly understood as referring to the Garden of Eden in its paradisiacal afterlife context. This more familiar translation might be preferable in contexts where the cultural reference is more important than the literal wording.

[C] Or: "and at the time of final redemption" — This alternate translation captures the eschatological meaning of the phrase rather than its literal wording. In kabbalistic thought, 'the right hand' represents God's attribute of mercy (Chesed), and 'the end of the right' refers to the final redemption that will come through divine mercy. This translation might be preferable in contexts where clarity of meaning is prioritized over literal rendering.

[1] This refers to a kabbalistic concept where the souls of the righteous are organized into seven distinct categories in the afterlife, each with its own level of spiritual attainment and corresponding heavenly dwelling place.

[iv] This refers to the kabbalistic concept of seven distinct categories of righteous souls in the Garden of Eden, each with its own level and dwelling place. These categories are variously enumerated in rabbinic literature, but typically include martyrs, those who died from illness, the perfectly righteous, etc.

[v] This phrase literally means 'to the end of the right' and is a kabbalistic reference to the sefirah of Chesed (loving-kindness), which is positioned on the right side of the sefirotic tree. It suggests that the resurrection will come through God's attribute of mercy rather than judgment.

[vi] This is a direct quotation from Daniel 12:13, where the angel tells Daniel about his fate after death. The verse has become central to Jewish understanding of resurrection and the afterlife.

[i] Cf. Daniel 12:13 — The citation of Daniel 12:13 explicitly connects this prayer to the Jewish belief in bodily resurrection. By invoking this verse, the prayer assures the deceased that their current rest is temporary, and they will ultimately 'stand in their allotted place'—be resurrected—at the end of days. | Cf. Psalm 97:11 — The citation of Psalm 97:11 at the prayer's conclusion reinforces the belief that the deceased righteous will experience divine illumination and joy in the afterlife, providing comfort to both the deceased and the mourners by emphasizing divine reward for righteousness. | Cf. 1 Samuel 25:29 — The phrase 'bound in the bond of life' (צְרוּרוֹת בִּצְרוֹר הַחַיִּים) is a direct allusion to 1 Samuel 25:29, where Abigail tells David that his soul will be 'bound in the bundle of life with the Lord your God.' In Jewish tradition, this became a central metaphor for the afterlife, representing the soul's secure preservation under divine protection after death. Its inclusion in this prayer affirms the belief that the deceased's soul continues to exist in a protected relationship with God. | Cf. Psalm 97:10 — This verse reinforces the theme of divine protection for the souls of the righteous, offering reassurance that God continues to guard the deceased from harmful spiritual forces even after death. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This prayer exemplifies Ma'avar Yabok's approach to death as a transition rather than an end. It integrates kabbalistic concepts (the seven classes of the righteous), biblical citations, and Jewish eschatology (resurrection at 'the end of days') to provide a comprehensive vision of the soul's journey after death. The prayer articulates the book's central purpose: to facilitate the soul's successful passage from this world to the next.

Master of all Worlds, King of Kings, may You forgive and pardon all my iniquities and atone for all my transgressions. Create for me a pure and good heart, and instill within my heart Your love and reverence. Subdue my inclination to serve You,[2] humble my stubbornness to return to You, and save me from sins and evil thoughts. Strengthen my good inclination over my evil inclination and open my heart to Your Torah. Attach my heart to engage in it, so that on the day of my death I may be like the day of my birth—without any sin or iniquity found in me.

Grant my heart the strength to keep Your commandments and privilege me to witness the coming of the Redeemer. Inscribe me in the Book of Life on this Day of Judgment[3] and renew upon me a good year. Send blessing upon all the works of my hands, allot my sustenance, and provide for me abundantly from Your hands rather than from flesh and blood. Raise my stature, elevate my fortune,[4] and grant me grace, kindness, and mercy in Your eyes and in the eyes of all who behold me.

By the merit of [name] and by the merit of all

[2]This concluding verse from Psalm 97:11 reinforces the prayer's emphasis on divine reward and illumination for the righteous in the afterlife, providing comfort to both the deceased and the mourners.

[1]This is a heading or title for one of several prayer texts in Ma'avar Yabok intended for recitation at gravesites. The phrase 'תפלה אחרת' (another prayer) indicates this is part of a sequence of multiple prayers for cemetery use.

[2]The Hebrew phrase "וְכוֹף אֶת יִצְרִי לְהִשְׁתַּעְבֵּד לָךְ" literally means "bend my inclination to be subjugated to You." This reflects the Jewish concept of the yetzer (inclination) that needs to be directed toward divine service.

[3]This language is borrowed from High Holiday liturgy, specifically Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur prayers, though here it's adapted for use in a cemetery prayer context.

[1]The Hebrew term "מַזָּלִי" (mazali) refers to one's astrological fortune or destiny. In rabbinic literature, while astrology is often viewed skeptically, the concept of mazal as divine influence on one's life was widely accepted.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This is a section heading for one of several different prayer texts provided in Ma'avar Yabok for recitation at graves. The text follows other grave prayers and precedes additional cemetery-related liturgy, indicating it belongs to a collection of prayers designed for cemetery visitation.

[iii]This reference to being "like the day of my birth—without any sin" draws on the rabbinic concept that a newborn is without sin, and connects to the idea that death, when approached properly, can be a form of spiritual purification like birth.

[i]The phrase "on this Day of Judgment" suggests this prayer could be intended for recitation during the High Holy Days (particularly Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur), but the context indicates it is part of a cemetery prayer that incorporates language from various liturgical contexts.

[2]The Hebrew term "וְיָלִיץ" (ve-yalitz) comes from the root meaning "to intercede" or "advocate," and carries a specific legal connotation in rabbinic literature, suggesting representation before the heavenly court.

[3]In Jewish tradition, there are specific prayers and rituals associated with leaving a cemetery, including washing one's hands without blessing and reciting certain verses. This instruction introduces one such prayer that should be recited at the moment of departure from the burial grounds.

[4]The Hebrew term 'ketoret' specifically refers to the sacred incense offering prepared according to a divinely prescribed formula and burned in the ancient Temple. This connection between prayer and Temple ritual is a central theme in Ma'avar Yabok.

[5]This is a technical term in Jewish theology (lifnim mishurat hadin) referring to divine conduct that transcends strict justice to incorporate mercy and compassion. In the context of cemetery prayers, it's a particularly appropriate request, as Jewish tradition views death as a time when divine mercy is especially needed.

[1]The imagery of not returning empty-handed from God's presence draws on biblical imagery of pilgrims bringing offerings to the Temple and not appearing 'empty-handed' before God (Exodus 23:15). In this cemetery prayer, the petitioner asks that their spiritual pilgrimage to the graves of the righteous similarly result in divine blessing.

[ii]The practice of invoking the merit of the righteous (זכות צדיקים) at gravesites reflects the belief that the deceased righteous can intercede on behalf of the living, a concept that gained prominence in medieval Jewish mysticism.

[iii]Cf. Psalms 51:12 — The prayer draws on penitential language from Psalms, particularly those attributed to King David, connecting personal repentance with preparation for death. | Cf. Deuteronomy 6:5 — By incorporating language from the central Jewish prayer of faith, the supplication connects deathbed piety with lifelong devotion to God. | Cf. Rosh Hashanah liturgy — The prayer creates a parallel between the annual judgment of Rosh Hashanah and the final judgment at death, suggesting similar spiritual preparation is needed for both. | Cf. Psalm 20:5-6 — This creates a connection between the personal prayer at a gravesite and the communal prayers for divine assistance found in Psalms.

[iv]This short instruction appears in Ma'avar Yabok after a series of prayers to be recited at the graveside. It introduces a prayer to be said specifically when departing from the cemetery.

[v]The comparison of prayer to incense (ketoret) refers to the Temple incense offering, which had purifying and protective spiritual properties. In Ma'avar Yabok, this metaphor appears frequently, especially in the section titled 'Eter Anan HaKetoret' (Cloud of Incense Prayer), which explores how words of prayer create metaphysical effects similar to the ancient Temple service.

[i]This phrase literally means 'inside the line of judgment' and refers to divine conduct that goes beyond strict justice to incorporate mercy. In the context of cemetery prayers, it's a request that God judge the deceased with mercy rather than strict justice.

[A] Or: “Prayer dispatched from Jerusalem, may it be rebuilt and reestablished speedily in our days” — This more expansive translation unpacks the full traditional blessing contained in the תוב״ב acronym, which might be preferable for readers unfamiliar with this convention in Jewish texts.

[2] This final line is not part of the prayer itself but an editorial note marking the end of the cemetery prayer section in Ma’avar Yabok. Such structural markers appear throughout the text and help organize its extensive liturgical content.

[ii] This refers to the righteous individuals buried in the cemetery. Ma’avar Yabok consistently presents the merit of the righteous dead as a basis for divine favor, reflecting the Jewish belief that the deceased maintain spiritual influence and can intercede on behalf of the living.

[iii] This line is not part of the prayer itself but a scribal or editorial note indicating the conclusion of the section on cemetery prayers in Ma’avar Yabok.

[iv] Cf. Psalm 141:2 — The text opens by connecting the petitioner’s prayer to the Temple incense offering, a theme that appears throughout Ma’avar Yabok, particularly in its fourth section titled ‘Eter Anan HaKetoret’ (Cloud of Incense Prayer). | Cf. Ma’avar Yabok, Section 5 (Eter Anan HaKetoret) — This prayer appears at the conclusion of a section on cemetery prayers and reflects the book’s consistent theme that prayer serves as a spiritual substitute for Temple sacrifices, particularly the ketoret (incense) offering. | Cf. Psalm 19:14 — This direct quotation from Psalm 19:14 is commonly used to conclude Jewish prayers. In the context of cemetery prayers, it takes on additional significance as a petition that one’s words on behalf of the deceased be accepted. | Cf. Talmud Berakhot 16b — This sentiment echoes Talmudic discussions about the individual’s direct relationship with God in prayer, particularly in moments of vulnerability like visiting graves where no intermediary can fully represent one’s personal petition.

[v] This is an acronym for ‘תִּבָּנֶה וְתִכּוֹנֵן בִּמְהֵרָה בְיָמֵינוּ’ (may it be rebuilt and established speedily in our days), a traditional phrase appended to mentions of Jerusalem after its destruction, expressing hope for its restoration.

[vi] Cf. Ma’avar Yabok — The subsequent passage explains that the author received an ancient prayer text from Jerusalem that he is now publishing. This heading indicates that what follows is that Jerusalem prayer, suggesting it carries special authority or efficacy.

[1] This phrase marks the beginning of material sent from Jerusalem to the author of Ma'avar Yabok. It introduces a prayer that follows, establishing its provenance as coming directly from the Holy City, which gives the prayer special authority in Jewish tradition.

[1] This triple denial is a significant theological concept in rabbinic thought. It relates to various sins throughout Jewish history: the denial of God through idol worship, the rejection of the Davidic monarchy (symbolizing messianic hope), and the desecration or neglect of the Temple. These three denials are understood to have led to exile and continued suffering.

[i] The author emphasizes the spiritual power of collective prayer and ritual, believing that when many people join together in performing a commandment or prayer, their unified intention creates a greater spiritual effect.

[ii] This metaphor comparing the breath of prayer to incense connects to both biblical traditions (where prayers are likened to incense in Psalms) and to Ma'avar Yabok itself, which has a section titled 'Eter Anan HaKetoret' (Cloud of Incense Prayer) focusing on prayer as a spiritual substitute for Temple sacrifices.

[iii] Cf. Me'irei Shachar (Illuminators of Dawn) — The author is referencing his own prayer collection as the source of his established practices regarding what prayers to share with the public. This collection was evidently used by a prayer society in Modena that gathered for morning prayers. | Cf. Jerusalem as center of Jewish spiritual authority — The author is invoking the traditional Jewish concept that the air of the Land of Israel makes one wise ('avira d'Eretz Yisrael machkim'), giving special authority to prayers and religious texts that originate there. | Cf. Prayer as incense — This alludes to the biblical concept that prayers are like incense rising before God, as expressed in Psalm 141:2: 'May my prayer be set before you like incense.' This is particularly significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok, as one section of the book is titled 'Eter Anan HaKetoret' (Cloud of Incense Prayer).

[iv] This phrase appears at the beginning of a letter or document from Jerusalem that introduces a prayer text. The phrase marks a transition from the author's introduction to the quoted content from Jerusalem.

[v] Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, author's introduction — Throughout Ma'avar Yabok, the author frequently introduces materials from other sources, especially those with special religious authority. This phrase introduces content specifically from Jerusalem, which would have carried particular weight as coming from the Holy City.

[i] Yalkut Shimoni is a medieval midrashic compilation. The reference here is to a passage found in its commentary on the book of Samuel, where Rabbi Simon teaches that Israel needs to seek mercy for denying God, King David, and the Temple.

Rabbi Simon. Although we pray for these three in our regular prayers, we do not have a prayer specifically dedicated to this matter. It is fitting for those who fear God and think upon His name to pray concerning these three things and to seek mercy from the God of Heaven regarding this mystery, and to confess their iniquity and the iniquity of their fathers in the trespass which they committed against Him. 5155R 5160R

For this purpose, we have arranged a short prayer to be recited during the morning watch, when the gates of mercy are open,[1] or at the time of the evening offering after their regular prayers. Parts of this prayer have been adapted from the Rosh Hashanah liturgy and parts from Pirkei Heichalot. One should practice it thus: prostrate before your God,[2] weep over the sins of your youth, and confess your sins and the sins of your fathers after returning to your God with a whole heart. 5165R 5170R

Before reciting this prayer, how good and pleasant it is[3] to set aside a coin for charity in the name of all Israel, and to say aloud, “I hereby give this coin to charity in the name of all Israel.” Through this act, one becomes among those who bring merit to the 5175R

[2] Jewish mystical tradition identifies specific times when divine mercy is especially accessible. The morning watch (the last third of the night before dawn) is considered particularly favorable for prayers of supplication and forgiveness.

[3] The Hebrew term יתנפל (yitnapel) has connotations beyond mere physical prostration—it suggests throwing oneself down in complete submission and desperate supplication. This intensifies the penitential character of the prayer being described.

[1] This phrase echoes Psalms 133:1, “Behold, how good and pleasant it is for brothers to dwell together in unity,” connecting the individual charitable act to communal harmony.

[ii] This Aramaic phrase means “this mystery” or “this secret matter” and appears frequently in mystical texts. Its use here signals that the denial of God, David, and the Temple has profound mystical significance beyond simple historical events.

[iii] Pirkei Heichalot (Chapters of the Palaces) is an early Jewish mystical text from the Merkavah mystical tradition, focusing on ascent through heavenly palaces toward the divine throne. Incorporating elements from this text suggests this prayer has mystical dimensions beyond simple petition.

[i] Cf. Yalkut Shimoni on Samuel — This midrashic text is cited as the theological basis for the prayer being introduced, establishing why repentance for these three specific denials is necessary. | Cf. Pirkei Heichalot — The author states that portions of the prayer have been adapted from this mystical text, suggesting the prayer incorporates mystical elements focused on heavenly structures and divine attributes. | Cf. Rosh Hashanah liturgy — The author acknowledges borrowing elements from the Rosh Hashanah prayers, which focus on themes of repentance, divine sovereignty, and judgment—all relevant to the theological concerns being addressed. | Cf. Leviticus 26:40 — The phrase “confess their iniquity and the iniquity of their fathers” echoes this verse from Leviticus, establishing biblical precedent for transgenerational confession.

[ii] This phrase references Daniel 12:3 where “those who lead many to righteousness will shine like the stars forever.” By giving charity on behalf of all Israel, one elevates the entire community and is counted among those who bring merit to the many.

And it is said: "I have blotted out, like a thick cloud, 5185R 5190R

[2]The Hebrew phrase "matzdikey ha-rabbim" comes from Daniel 12:3 and refers to those who cause many others to become righteous. Here it suggests that by giving charity on behalf of all Jews, one causes the entire community to fulfill the commandment of charity.

[3]This reflects the kabbalistic concept that human charitable actions have cosmic significance, literally establishing and supporting God's heavenly throne.

[4]I've maintained the traditional tripartite confession formula which represents increasing levels of intentional wrongdoing in Jewish thought. These three Hebrew terms have slightly different connotations that aren't fully captured in English: חטא (sin) can mean missing the mark or unintentional error; עון (transgression) implies knowingly doing wrong; and פשע (rebellion) suggests deliberate defiance of divine will.

[1]The doubling of 'I' (אָנֹכִי אָנֹכִי) in the Hebrew creates an emphasis that I've tried to capture with 'I, even I' in English. This emphasizes that forgiveness comes from God's initiative rather than human merit.

[iii]This alludes to Proverbs 16:12, "The throne is established through righteousness." In Jewish mystical thought, charitable acts have cosmic significance in establishing and supporting the divine throne.

[iv]Shaddai is one of the divine names of God, often associated with God's protective and nurturing aspects. It appears on mezuzot and is traditionally understood as an acronym for "Guardian of the Doors of Israel."

[v]Cf. Proverbs 16:12 — The text draws on Proverbs 16:12 which states that a throne is established through righteousness (צדקה), adapting it to emphasize the power of charitable giving to establish divine favor and cosmic order. | Cf. Daniel 12:3 — The phrase "those who bring merit to the many" (מצדיקי הרבים) directly references Daniel 12:3 which speaks of "those who lead many to righteousness" (מצדיקי הרבים) shining like stars forever. This connects the simple act of giving charity on behalf of others with the profound cosmic reward described in Daniel. | Cf. Psalms 21:6 — The passage echoes Psalms 21:6 which speaks of glory, splendor and majesty being placed upon the king/righteous person. Here it's adapted to describe divine attributes being spread over the community through the merit of charitable giving.

[i]This is the traditional tripartite confession formula in Jewish liturgy, particularly associated with Yom Kippur. The three terms represent increasingly severe categories of wrongdoing: חטא (chet) refers to missing the mark or sinning unintentionally; עון (avon) indicates conscious wrongdoing; and פשע (pesha) represents deliberate rebellion or transgression against God.

[ii]This is a direct quotation from Isaiah 43:25, highlighting God's promise to forgive sins for His own sake rather than because of human merit. The repetition of 'אָנֹכִי' (I) emphasizes divine initiative in forgiveness.

[iii]This quote from Isaiah 44:22 employs the metaphor of clouds being dispersed to represent the complete removal of sins, suggesting that divine forgiveness is thorough and leaves no trace of previous transgressions.

וְכֶעָנָן חַטֹּאתֶיךָ[vi] שׁוּבָה אֵלַי כִּי גְאַלְתִּיךָ:[i]

(Psalm 130) A Song of Ascents. From the depths I have called You, O LORD.[A] Lord, hear my voice; let Your ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications. If You, O LORD, should mark iniquities,[1] O Lord, who could stand? But with You there is forgiveness, that You may be feared.[2] I wait for the LORD, my soul waits, and for His word I hope. My soul longs for the Lord more than watchmen for the morning, watchmen for the morning.[B] Let Is- 5195R 5200R

[A]Or: "Out of the depths I cry to You, O LORD" — This alternative translation emphasizes the present tense and ongoing nature of the cry for help, which might be more appropriate in a contemporary liturgical context where the psalm is being actively recited by someone in distress.

[A]Or: "My soul [waits] for the Lord more than watchmen for the morning, more than watchmen for the morning" — The Hebrew doesn't contain an explicit verb between 'my soul' and 'for the Lord,' so 'waits' could be supplied instead of 'longs' to maintain consistency with the previous verse's emphasis on waiting. This creates a stronger connection between the verses and emphasizes the theme of patient anticipation.

[2]The Hebrew uses two different terms for 'cloud': 'עב' (thick cloud or rain cloud) and 'ענן' (standard cloud), which I've tried to preserve in translation. The metaphor suggests complete erasure, as clouds disperse and leave no trace.

[3]The Hebrew "tishmor" (should mark/keep track of) carries connotations of keeping a record or account. The verse acknowledges the impossibility of standing before divine judgment if God were to maintain a ledger of human sins, which connects directly to Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on confession and spiritual preparation before death.

[1]The Hebrew phrase "lema'an tivare'" suggests that divine forgiveness paradoxically increases reverence or awe toward God rather than diminishing it. This theological point aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's presentation of death as both fearsome and potentially redemptive when approached with proper spiritual preparation.

[iv]Cf. Isaiah 43:25 — The prayer quotes this verse from Isaiah where God promises to forgive sins, using it as a scriptural basis for requesting divine forgiveness. This verse is a cornerstone of Jewish penitential liturgy. | Cf. Isaiah 44:22 — This second Isaiah verse reinforces the theme of divine forgiveness using the metaphor of clouds being dispersed, suggesting complete removal of sins. Its inclusion strengthens the supplicant's appeal by citing multiple divine promises of forgiveness. | Cf. Yom Kippur liturgy — The tripartite confession formula 'I have sinned, I have transgressed, I have rebelled' (חטאתי עויתי פשעתי) is a standard element in Jewish confessional prayers, particularly central to Yom Kippur liturgy. Its use here connects this prayer to established patterns of Jewish penitence. | Cf. Vidui (confession) prayers — The prayer follows the traditional structure of Jewish vidui (confession), beginning with the address to God (אנא י״י) followed by the triple confession formula. This would be recognizable to the reader as part of the established pattern of Jewish penitential prayer, particularly significant in the context of Ma'avar Yabok's focus on end-of-life spiritual preparation.

[v]This psalm, known as "De Profundis" from its Latin translation, is traditionally recited in times of distress and appears in Ma'avar Yabok's prayer sequences for the sick and dying. The Hebrew phrase "from the depths" (mimaamakim) can be understood both literally as depths of physical distress and metaphorically as the depths of spiritual anguish.

[i]This verse is particularly significant in Ma'avar Yabok's context of deathbed rituals, as it acknowledges human imperfection while expressing hope in divine forgiveness. The confession (vidui) prayers in the book similarly balance acknowledgment of sin with trust in divine mercy.

[ii]The repetition of "watchmen for the morning" creates a poetic emphasis that conveys intense longing. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this resonates with the deathbed vigil where attendants watch over the dying person, awaiting a transition that brings both trepidation and hope.

יְיָ כִּי עִם יְיָ חַסְדָּ וְהַרְבֵּה עִמּוֹ פְּדוּת: וְהוּא יִפְדֶּה אֶת יִשְׂרָאֵל מִכֹּל עֲוֹנֹתָיו:[i][ii]

Please, O LORD, we and our ancestors have sinned, we have done wrong, we have acted wickedly, and we have denied Your divinity, Your king David, and Your holy and glorious Temple.[2] We said, "We have no part in David, nor inheritance in the son of Jesse. To your tents, O Israel!" Now we have returned, 5210R

[B]Or: "And He Himself will redeem Israel from all its iniquities" — Adding 'Himself' emphasizes the personal divine action in redemption, and changing 'his' to 'its' clarifies that the iniquities belong to the collective Israel rather than to God. However, the Hebrew can be legitimately read either way, and traditional interpretations often maintain the personal pronoun.

[C]Or: "Then he should repeat the confession and recite:" — This alternate translation is more concise and captures the practical instruction. It might be preferred in contexts where clarity of ritual direction is prioritized over literal rendering.

[D]Or: "Following this, he should again make confession and pronounce:" — This translation emphasizes the repetitive nature of the confession ritual, which might be helpful in contexts where the cyclical or iterative aspects of the deathbed ritual are being highlighted.

[2]The Hebrew "harbeh imo pedut" literally means "with Him is abundant redemption." The term "pedut" (redemption) carries connotations of ransom or release from bondage, which in Ma'avar Yabok's context connects to the soul's release from both sin and physical existence at death.

[1]This confession reflects a rabbinic interpretation that Israel's sins collectively involve denial of three elements: God's sovereignty, the Davidic monarchy (with its messianic implications), and the sanctity of the Temple. This threefold pattern structures the entire prayer.

[iii]This concluding verse offers reassurance of complete redemption from sin, which aligns with Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on proper deathbed confession (vidui) as facilitating atonement and spiritual purification before death.

[iv]Cf. Confession (vidui) prayers in Ma'avar Yabok — Psalm 130 serves as a theological foundation for the confession rituals in Ma'avar Yabok, expressing the same movement from depths of sin to heights of divine mercy that characterizes the book's approach to death as spiritual transition. | Cf. Psalm 130 in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequences — The inclusion of this psalm in Ma'avar Yabok's liturgical sequences for the sick and dying reflects its thematic appropriateness for contexts of distress and its expression of hope in divine forgiveness even in the face of mortality. | Cf. References to "awaiting salvation" in Ma'avar Yabok — The psalm's emphasis on waiting and hoping ("I wait for the LORD, my soul waits") resonates with Ma'avar Yabok's recurring theme of patient anticipation of divine salvation, both in terms of physical healing and ultimate spiritual redemption.

[i]This phrase marks an important transition in the deathbed ritual sequence. Having completed certain prayers, the dying person (or someone reciting on their behalf) is instructed to return to the formal confession (vidui). This demonstrates the central importance of confession in Ma'avar Yabok's approach to proper spiritual preparation for death.

[ii]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Discourse 2, Chapter 22 — This instruction is likely drawing on the extensive discussion of vidui (confession) found in Discourse 2, Chapter 22, where the author explains both the practical procedures and mystical dimensions of deathbed confession. The instruction to 'return and confess' reflects the text's emphasis on confession as a central element of proper preparation for death. | Cf. Zohar III:88a — Ma'avar Yabok's emphasis on confession before death is likely informed by Zoharic passages like III:88a, which explains how confession purifies the soul and facilitates its proper transition to the next world. The instruction to 'return and confess' reflects this Zoharic understanding of confession as essential spiritual preparation.

we have regretted, we have repented, and we have sought all three:[1] the LORD our God, David our king, and our holy and glorious Temple. As it is written: "Afterward, the children of Israel shall return and seek the LORD their God and David their king, and they shall fear the LORD and His goodness in the latter days." Please, O LORD, be found by us and be sought by us, and perform for us a sign for good. Shine Your face upon Your desolate sanctuary for the sake of the Lord, and gather the dispersed of those who hope in You,[2] and may the Temple be rebuilt. Indeed, we know that You have chosen the son of Jesse, and thus may Your name, O LORD our God, be magnified over Israel Your people. And thus, instill Your fear, O LORD our God, upon all Your works, and Your dread upon all You have created. 5215R 5220R 5225R

Therefore, we hope to You, O LORD our God, to see speedily the glory of Your might, to remove idols from the earth, and false gods shall be utterly cut off, to perfect the world under the kingdom of the Almighty, and all flesh shall call upon Your name, to turn to You all the wicked of the earth. All the inhabitants of the world shall recognize and know that to You every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear. Before You, O LORD our God, they shall kneel and fall, and to the glory of Your name they shall give honor. They shall all accept the yoke of Your kingdom,[3] and You shall reign over them speedily forever and ever. For the kingdom is Yours, and to all eternity You shall reign in glory. 5230R 5235R 5240R

[2]The original Hebrew uses the expression 'u-shlashtem bikashnu' (literally 'and the three of them we sought'), which creates a deliberate contrast with the threefold denial mentioned earlier. I've made this explicit by adding 'all three' to clarify the connection.

[3]The phrase 'nefutzot kovecha' (literally 'the scattered of those who hope for You') is a poetic reference to the Jewish diaspora, connecting the idea of physical dispersion with the continued hope for divine redemption.

[1]The image of accepting 'the yoke of the kingdom' (ol malchut) is a central rabbinic concept referring to willingly submitting to divine sovereignty, particularly through fulfilling commandments. This phrase appears in the daily Shema prayer and is echoed here in an eschatological context.

[i]Cf. Aleinu Prayer — By incorporating elements of the Aleinu, this prayer connects the specific confession of denying David's kingship with the broader Jewish eschatological vision of universal divine recognition and the perfection of the world. | Cf. Hosea 3:5 — This biblical verse serves as the textual foundation for the prayer's central theme: the eventual restoration of Israel's relationship with both God and the Davidic (messianic) kingship. | Cf. 1 Kings 12:16 — This historical rejection of Davidic rule is reinterpreted in the prayer as a spiritual failing requiring repentance, connecting political history with theological meaning. | Cf. Yom Kippur Confessional Prayers — By using the language of ritual confession, the prayer frames the historical rejection of Davidic kingship as a sin requiring atonement, elevating a political event to the level of religious transgression.

[ii]This opening formula 'U'vchen' (And therefore) marks the beginning of a section from the High Holiday Amidah prayer that focuses on God's sovereignty and the hope for divine kingship.

[A] Or: "and an opening of the mouth to those who hope in You" — This more literal translation preserves the Hebrew idiom 'pitchon peh' (opening of the mouth), which conveys both the ability to speak and the opportunity to express oneself. The context suggests both the granting of opportunity to speak and the capacity for eloquence.

[B] Or: "and iniquity shall shut its mouth" — The term 'olatah' can refer to both injustice and iniquity or wickedness. This alternate translation emphasizes the moral dimension of the term rather than its legal implications.

[2] This prayer begins with the liturgical formula 'U'vchen' (And therefore) that links divine sovereignty with human flourishing, suggesting that God's kingship is manifest through Israel's honor.

[3] The Hebrew term 'keren' (horn) symbolizes power and sovereignty, while 'ner' (lamp) represents both guidance and the perpetual light of monarchy. These dual metaphors express hope for messianic restoration.

[4] The Hebrew term 'memshelet zadon' (dominion of arrogance) can be understood as referring to both earthly tyrannies and spiritual forces of evil. In Ma'avar Yabok's context of death rituals, this may also represent the defeat of death itself.

[iii] The 'horn' (keren) is a biblical symbol of strength and power, while the 'lamp' (ner) represents continuity and guidance. Together these metaphors express hope for the restoration of the Davidic monarchy.

[iv] The image of wickedness vanishing like smoke recalls both the sacrificial smoke of the Temple and the impermanence of evil in contrast to God's eternal justice.

[i] This verse from Zechariah 14:9 is a central part of the Aleinu prayer and expresses the ultimate hope for universal recognition of divine unity.

[A] Or: "it shall be an everlasting covenant for them" — This translation more clearly communicates the meaning while maintaining the emphasis on the perpetual nature of the covenant.

[A] Or: "Please have mercy upon the surviving remnant of Jerusalem's exile" — 'Ariel' is a poetic name for Jerusalem, and this translation makes the reference more explicit for readers unfamiliar with this biblical epithet for the holy city.

[B] Or: "are there no children for Israel?" — This translation captures the plaintive quality of the rhetorical question while allowing for a broader interpretation of 'banim' as children rather than specifically sons.

[1] The language of divine inscription echoes the High Holiday prayers where God inscribes individuals in the Book of Life. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this links the individual's death with the larger themes of judgment and redemption.

[2] The 'birth pangs of the Messiah' (chevlei mashiach) refers to the suffering and tribulations believed to precede the messianic era. In the context of death rituals, this acknowledges personal suffering while placing it within a redemptive framework.

[3] This alphabetical listing of divine attributes follows the complete Hebrew alphabet (alef through tav), symbolizing the totality of divine qualities. Each attribute begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet.

[ii] This passage lists divine attributes in an alphabetical acrostic, beginning with the Hebrew letters alef, bet, gimel, and continuing through the entire alphabet. Such acrostics are common in liturgical poetry and symbolize completeness and divine perfection.

[i] This rhetorical questioning of God's apparent hostility toward Israel follows a traditional Jewish literary pattern of respectful challenge to divine justice, similar to Abraham's negotiation for Sodom and Moses' intercession for Israel.

[ii] 'Ariel' is a poetic name for Jerusalem found in Isaiah 29:1, where the prophet addresses the city as 'Ariel, the city where David encamped.'

אַתָּה אָבִינוּ כִּי אַבְרָהָם לֹא יְדָעָנוּ וְיִשְׂרָאֵל לֹא יַכִּירֵנוּ[i] אַתָּה יְיָ אָבִינוּ גּוֹאֲלֵנוּ מֵעוֹלָם שְׁמֶךָ: בָּרוּךְ יְיָ לְעוֹלָם אָמֵן וְאָמֵן: [ii]

One should not provide medical treatment to a sick person for payment, but only in exchange for the effort and expenses.[A] If the patient's family members say to the physician, "We will purchase, make the effort, and take care of everything—just tell us what to do," the physician should not take anything from them, in accordance with the principle "You shall walk in His ways." Furthermore, healing comes from a place of pure compassion that does not depend on any person nor wait for human beings, which 5R 10R

[A] Or: "A physician should not charge a patient for medical treatment itself, but only for their effort and expenses" — This alternate translation more clearly conveys the halakhic principle being described, making it explicit that this refers to physicians' fees rather than a general statement about providing treatment.

[1] The text concludes by affirming God's eternal role as Redeemer (go'alenu), linking the personal journey of the soul after death with the cosmic redemption of all Israel, suggesting that death itself is merely another exile from which God will ultimately redeem the soul.

[i] "You shall walk in His ways" (Deuteronomy 28:9)—a biblical commandment to emulate God's attributes, here applied to healing without seeking profit, as God heals without compensation.

[ii] Cf. High Holiday liturgy (Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur prayers) — This passage incorporates significant portions of the High Holiday liturgy, particularly from the Amidah prayer, which focuses on God's sovereignty and the hope for messianic redemption. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, these prayers for divine kingship and restoration connect the individual's death journey to the larger cosmic redemption. | Cf. Zechariah 8:3 — This biblical quotation from Zechariah affirms God's promise to restore Jerusalem, which serves in Ma'avar Yabok as a parallel to the soul's own journey toward redemption and divine dwelling. | Cf. Obadiah 1:21 and Zechariah 14:9 — This passage combines verses from Obadiah and Zechariah that prophecy ultimate divine sovereignty. In the context of death rituals, this affirms that the individual's soul journey is part of a larger cosmic process culminating in divine unity. | Cf. Ezekiel 37:24-26 — These verses from Ezekiel's vision of resurrection and restoration connect directly to Ma'avar Yabok's themes of death and renewal. The mention of the 'covenant of peace' is particularly significant in a text dealing with the soul's peaceful transition after death. | Cf. Isaiah 63:16 — This reference from Isaiah emphasizes the direct relationship between the individual and God, beyond ancestral mediation. In the context of death rituals, it provides comfort that even when separated from the community of Israel through death, God remains the ultimate Father and Redeemer of the soul. | Cf. Alphabetical acrostic of divine attributes — This alphabetical listing of divine attributes represents the completeness of God's kingship. In Ma'avar Yabok's context of death rituals, it suggests that the soul's journey is encompassed within the totality of divine qualities, providing complete protection and guidance.

[iii] This verse from Isaiah 63:16 emphasizes God's direct parental relationship with Israel, suggesting that even when the patriarchs might not recognize their descendants, God's connection remains unbroken.

is why we say, "For You are a merciful and faithful healing God."

When a person falls ill, they should quickly put their affairs in order and issue instructions to their household. Indeed, we find that Hezekiah was told, "Set your house in order." One's final testament should be made before witnesses, and one should not trust even one's father, much less one's children or wife. At that time, one should urge one's children to keep the way of the Lord, to perform acts of charity and justice. When a father instructs his children about what he wants done first, he should mention it last. If he knows his children are quarrelsome, he should divide his estate before his death to prevent strengthening the forces of accusation[A] through their intensified quarreling with one another, which would cause God's name to be profaned among them through oaths and insults, and by bringing their case before a judge. By preventing his children from engaging in disputes, he intends to weaken the forces of judgment and remove Satan from his house,[B] for in a house of strife, there Satan rests, as it is said, "Woe that Rabbi Meir expelled him from that house."

Woe to the soul of a father who, through his poor management, causes quarreling among his children,[C] for he too will not rest peacefully in his grave, and he gives power to the forces of judgment to prevail against him, God forbid,[1] for "they roll..."[2] But if he is wise and foresees what will be born of his actions, making corrections to the extent

[B] Or: "the prosecuting spiritual forces" — The term has kabbalistic connotations referring to actual spiritual entities that act as accusers or prosecutors in the celestial court, rather than just abstract 'forces of accusation'.

[C] Or: "to weaken the powers of divine judgment and drive Satan away from his household" — This alternate translation better captures the kabbalistic concept of 'forces of judgment' (כחות הדין) as specifically divine judgment forces in the spiritual realms, not just general judgment.

[A] Or: "Woe to the soul of a father whose misguided leadership causes strife among his children" — The term הנהגתו refers more to leadership or governance than merely management, suggesting the father's role as a leader of the household rather than just an administrator.

[1] The Hebrew abbreviation 'ח״ו' (חס ושלום) literally means 'mercy and peace' and functions as an apotropaic formula to ward off the negative thing being mentioned.

[2] This is an abbreviated reference to the Talmudic principle 'מגלגלין זכות על ידי זכאי וחובה על ידי חייב' (merit is brought about through the meritorious and guilt through the guilty), suggesting that divine judgment operates through cause and effect.

[ii] This quotes God's instruction to King Hezekiah in Isaiah 38:1 when he was deathly ill, providing biblical precedent for putting one's affairs in order when facing serious illness.

[iii] This refers to a Talmudic story about Rabbi Meir driving Satan out of a house, with the implication that Satan then found another dwelling place. The author uses this to illustrate that discord creates a spiritual environment where negative forces can take residence.

ובשלום ובמישור יתנו מעדנים לנפשו וישכב ואין מחריד ואם רוע מזג בניו גרם זה אין לו אח״כ בזה אשם כי אב לא ישא בעון הבן. ועל זה נאמר יכבדו בניו ולא ידע. ברם מבעי ליה להביט מראשית אחרית לבל יהיה הוא והממון שהוריש להם סבה רחוקה או קרובה להבעיר אשו של גיהנם עליו ועליהם ומגביה ח״ו בחות היכל חמישי מהיכלי התמורות הנקרא איבה.[i] ועיקר כונתו תהיה לשמים ולתקון עליון ולהשבית אויב ומתנקם[3] למעלה ולמטה ממנו ומבניו.[ii]

he is able, of him it is said, "The righteous finds rest in his death." If, because of his instructions, his children behave with brotherhood, peace, and uprightness, they will provide delights for his soul, and he will lie down with none to make him afraid. However, if the poor disposition of his children caused this strife, he bears no guilt afterward, for "a father shall not bear the iniquity of his son." Concerning this it is said, "His sons come to honor, but he does not know it."

Nevertheless, he must look from the beginning to the end, lest he and the property he bequeaths to them become a distant or immediate cause for kindling the fire of Gehenna upon him and upon them, and—God forbid—elevate the powers of the fifth palace among the palaces of exchanges, which is called "enmity." His primary intention should be directed toward Heaven and the supernal rectification, to quiet the enemy and avenger[1] above and below, away from himself and his children.

ואם מצוה לקיים דברי המת יהיה מי שיהיה כ״ש שחובה על הבנים שלא לחטות ימין ושמאל מצוואת אביהם הנעשית ביושר

If there is a commandment to fulfill the words of the deceased, whoever they may be,[A] how much more so is it an obligation for children[2] not to deviate right or left from their father's will when it is made with [A] Or: "If it is a commandment to fulfill the wishes of the deceased, regardless of who they were" — This alternative translation may better convey the sense that the obligation applies universally, regardless of the deceased person's status.

[3] This phrase alludes to Psalm 8:3, 'להשבית אויב ומתנקם', which speaks of silencing God's enemies. Here it refers to neutralizing negative spiritual forces both in celestial realms ('above') and earthly domains ('below').

[1] The Hebrew phrase 'כ״ש' (kal va-chomer) indicates an a fortiori argument: if a general obligation exists to fulfill any deceased person's wishes, then children have an even stronger obligation toward their parents.

[i] This refers to Kabbalistic teachings about the structure of the impure spiritual realms, where the fifth palace among the 'palaces of exchange' (impure counterparts to the holy palaces) is associated with hatred and enmity. Family discord is understood to empower these negative spiritual realms.

[ii] Cf. You shall walk in His ways (והלכת בדרכיו) — This biblical phrase is invoked as the basis for the ethical obligation of physicians to act compassionately like God, providing healing without seeking profit beyond necessary expenses. | Cf. Set your house in order (צו לביתך) — This phrase comes from God's instruction to King Hezekiah when he was ill and expected to die, serving as biblical precedent for making final arrangements when seriously ill. | Cf. Woe that Rabbi Meir expelled him from that house (ווי דאפקיה רבי מאיר מההוא ביתא) — This appears to reference a Talmudic story where Rabbi Meir expelled Satan/discord from a house, with the implication that Satan then found another dwelling place, teaching that strife creates a dwelling place for negative spiritual forces. | Cf. The righteous finds rest in his death (וחוסה במותו צדיק) — This adapts the biblical verse that states 'the righteous has hope in his death' to emphasize that a righteous person who wisely arranges his affairs will find spiritual rest after death. | Cf. Fifth palace among the palaces of exchanges (היכל חמישי מהיכלי התמורות) — This refers to the kabbalistic concept of impure spiritual palaces (היכלי התמורות) that mirror the holy palaces, with the fifth one specifically associated with hatred and strife, suggesting that family discord empowers negative spiritual forces.

ולש״ש. ואם האב צוה לבנו דבר מה וחכמי המקום עם הבן נראה להם שהוא נגד כבודו אין צריך לקיים דבריו. אבל בזיון שהוא לכפרת נפשו כבוד יחשב לו: וכן המתפלל על אביו או על רבו לפום ריהטא נראה כי אין לומר בתחנתו רפא נא לאדוני אבי או אבא מרי או רבי ואלופי כי שלמה אמר בדברו עם ה׳ דוד אבי וכן אלישע אמר אלהי אליהו ולא אמר אדוני שאין גבהות לפני המקום. ואוריה נתחייב הריגה למלכות על שאמר לפני דוד ואדוני יואב ברם נראה לפי הדין שבאותם שאסור להזכיר שמם מותר לומר אבי או רבי אך לא יוסיף על זה. וראוי לדעת שכשחולאים יוצאים לעולם הם ע״י מלאכים משולחים הנקראת משלחת מלאכי רעים היוצאים מפתח שני ומפתח רביעי שבהיכל השלישי מהיכלי התמורות הנקראים אופל: ובפרשת תרומה דף רמ״ד אמר שמוצאם מזרוע שמאל מקומות הקליפה שהוא בשית דרגין כנתבאר שם: [i] integrity and for the sake of Heaven. However, if a father commanded his son to do something, and the local sages along with the son believe it to be against his honor, he need not fulfill his words. But humiliation that serves as atonement for his soul should be considered an honor to him.

Similarly, regarding one who prays for his father or teacher, at first glance it appears inappropriate to say in one's supplication "please heal my lord father" or "my father, my teacher" or "my teacher and my guide," since Solomon, when speaking with God, said "David my father," and likewise Elisha said "God of Elijah" and did not say "my lord," for there is no arrogance before the Omnipresent.[1] Uriah was condemned to death by the kingdom because he said before David "and my lord Joab." However, it appears that according to the law, for those whose names are forbidden to mention, it is permitted to say "my father" or "my teacher," but one should not add more than this.

It is important to know that when diseases come into the world, they come through dispatched angels called "the company of evil angels"[A][2] that emerge from the second entrance and the fourth entrance of the third palace of the Palaces of Exchange, which are called "darknes[B]s."[3] And in Parashat Terumah, page 244, it states that their origin is from the left arm, the places of the husk (kelipah) which exist in [B]Or: "that emerge from the second and fourth gates of the third hall in the Heichalot HaTemurot (Palaces of Exchange), which are called "Ofel" (darkness)" — This alternative retains the Hebrew term 'Ofel' for darkness and 'Heichalot HaTemurot' for Palaces of Exchange, which may be preferable when dealing with technical kabbalistic terminology. It also uses 'gates' instead of 'entrances' which may better reflect the mystical concept.

[A]Or: "that emerge from the second and fourth gates of the third hall in the Heichalot HaTemurot (Palaces of Exchange), which are called "Ofel" (darkness)" — This alternative retains the Hebrew term 'Ofel' for darkness and 'Heichalot HaTemurot' for Palaces of Exchange, which may be preferable when dealing with technical kabbalistic terminology. It also uses 'gates' instead of 'entrances' which may better reflect the mystical concept.

[2]The Hebrew term 'המקום' (HaMakom, literally 'The Place') is a traditional epithet for God, which I've translated as 'the Omnipresent' to convey its theological significance while maintaining the literal connection to place/location.

[3]The term 'משלחת מלאכי רעים' appears in Psalm 78:49 describing the plagues in Egypt. In kabbalistic literature, this concept was expanded to explain the spiritual origins of disease.

[1]The Hebrew terms 'היכלי התמורות' (Palaces of Exchange) and 'אופל' (darkness) are technical kabbalistic terms referring to spiritual realms associated with impurity and negative forces. These concepts are elaborated in zoharic literature as part of a complex mystical cosmology.

[i]Cf. Zohar, Parashat Terumah — The text cites this specific passage in the Zohar to explain the kabbalistic source of illness as emanating from specific locations within the mystical 'Palaces of Exchange' (Heichalot HaTemurot). This reference grounds the author's mystical explanation of disease in authoritative kabbalistic literature. | Cf. Talmud, Gittin 14b-15a — While not explicitly

It is further written in Sefer Hasidim that a certain pious man was bathing in a tub when he saw a radiance upon his head and upon the water. When his wife asked him what this radiance was, he told her that it was from the ink that remained on the quill after the supernal writing,[B] which the Holy One, blessed be He, wipes on the heads of the righteous whose time has come to depart from this world.[1] For the Holy One, blessed be He, makes a sign for the righteous who are destined to depart before their passing, and perhaps through this, a spirit of purity is added to them,[2] in accordance with "You add to their spirit, they expire" (Psalm 104:29). And this ink would be from the light of the Torah written above in black ink that shines as black fire upon white fire. And it says there that in that same week, that righteous man died. Similarly, my teacher, the Gaon of Fano, of blessed memory, wrote concerning

[B] Or: "And in the Zohar section on Parashat Terumah, page 244, it states that these emanate from the left arm, from the realms of the kelipah (impure husks) which exist in six gradations, as explained there" — This alternative makes it clearer that the reference is specifically to the Zohar commentary on Parashat Terumah, and provides more precise kabbalistic terminology for the concepts of 'kelipah' and 'levels/gradations'.

[C] Or: "the residual ink on the divine quill after the celestial writing" — This translation better captures the mystical imagery of divine instruments used in heavenly writing, emphasizing the celestial origin of this substance.

[2] The Hebrew phrase 'שהגיע זמנן ליפטר' uses the euphemistic term 'to depart' (ליפטר) rather than explicitly mentioning death, a common practice in Jewish texts.

[1] The text creates a wordplay connecting the verse 'תוסף רוחם יגועון' (literally 'You add to their spirit, they expire') with the idea that righteous people receive additional spiritual purity before death. This creatively reinterprets what is typically understood as God taking away breath (causing death) into God adding spiritual quality.

cited, the passage's opening discussion about the obligation to fulfill the wishes of the deceased (mitzvah lekayem divrei ha-met) appears to draw on talmudic discussions about this principle. The Talmud in Gittin discusses the extent and limitations of this obligation, which informs the author's halakhic framework. | Cf. 1 Kings 1:13 — The text cites this biblical precedent to establish rules about how one should refer to one's father or teacher in prayer, using it to demonstrate that certain honorific titles can be appropriately omitted when addressing God. | Cf. 2 Kings 2:14 — This biblical reference is used alongside the Solomon example to establish proper protocol for referring to one's teacher in prayer, showing that Elisha did not use the honorific 'my lord' when referring to his teacher Elijah in a prayer context.

[ii] This description of a luminous radiance appearing on a righteous person shortly before death reflects the Jewish mystical belief that the souls of the righteous begin to emit divine light as they prepare to depart from the physical world.

[iii] This striking metaphor presents the Holy One as using the heads of righteous individuals as places to wipe His divine quill, suggesting an intimate relationship between God and the righteous as they approach death.

[i] The imagery of 'black fire upon white fire' refers to a famous rabbinic description of the Torah as it exists in heaven (Talmud, Yerushalmi Shekalim 6:1). This mystical concept depicts the divine text as being composed of black fire (the letters) written upon white fire (the parchment).

the radiance of Moses our teacher's face, peace be upon him, explaining its origin.

And from the account written in the Zohar, Parashat Vayakhel, page 197,[1] it is evident that a person should hide himself when there is a plague[A] in the city, God forbid, and it [the Angel of Death] has permission to destroy.[2] They have already said, "When there is pestilence in the city, gather in your feet."[3] And they interpret this: "The way of an adulterous woman"—this refers to the Angel of Death, and thus it is called: "She eats and wipes her mouth" (Proverbs 30:20). It burns the world with its flames and kills people before their time has come, and says, "I have done no wrong,"[4] for it sought judgment against them because they were found with sins, and they died by righteous judgment. And it appears to me from the words of the Zohar that the Angel of Death emerges from the second chamber of the Exchanges [negative spiritual realms], which is called "impure destruction," and it dwells in the second entrance therein. May our God shine His goodness upon us,

[A] Or: "the Angel of Death (Samael)" — While the context clearly refers to epidemic disease, the Hebrew abbreviation שמ״ה likely refers specifically to Samael (סמאל), the Angel of Death. This is further supported by the Zohar passage referenced, which describes personified behavior. In many kabbalistic texts, the Angel of Death is directly associated with plagues and epidemics.

[2] The citation refers to the standard pagination of the printed Zohar, the central text of Jewish mysticism, which is organized following the weekly Torah portions.

[3] A significant concept in Jewish theology: destructive forces cannot act without divine permission. Even the Angel of Death operates within constraints established by God.

[4] This is a reference to the Talmudic dictum (Bava Kamma 60b) advising people to stay home during epidemics.

[5] The text portrays the Angel of Death as justifying its destructive actions by claiming it merely executes divine judgment against sinners, even when it appears to strike indiscriminately during epidemics.

[ii] This is an abbreviation for Samael (סמאל), the Angel of Death in Jewish tradition.

[iii] The text creatively reinterprets Proverbs 30:20, which originally describes an adulterous woman, as referring to the Angel of Death. This type of reinterpretation is characteristic of the midrashic and kabbalistic exegetical approach.

[i] This refers to specific chambers in the kabbalistic architecture of negative spiritual realms (קליפות/kelipot). According to this cosmology, the Angel of Death emerges from the second chamber in these negative realms, specifically from an entrance called 'impure destruction.'

[ii] The passage concludes with an Aramaic prayer asking for divine protection against the Angel of Death, reflecting the practical religious response to the metaphysical dangers just described.

[iii] Cf. Sefer Hasidim — The citation of Sefer Hasidim establishes this teaching as part of the Ashkenazic pietistic tradition, which often incorporated mystical elements while maintaining a focus on practical piety. The text uses this citation to provide an authoritative source for the belief that righteous individuals receive divine signs before death. | Cf. Zohar, Parashat Vayakhel — The citation of the Zohar grounds the teaching about the Angel of Death in the central text of kabbalah, giving it mystical authority. The Zohar often personifies spiritual forces, and here the author uses this reference to explain how the Angel of Death functions as a cosmic entity that executes divine judgment during plagues. | Cf. Proverbs 30:20 — The text reinterprets this biblical passage

The Order of Confession for the Deathly Ill,[A] with Certain Insights Pertaining to It,[2] as God Has Enlightened My Eyes,[B] in Order to Bring Merit to the Many[3]

[A] Or: "The Ritual of Confession for One on Their Deathbed" — This alternative more directly conveys the ritual nature of the text and the specific context of being on one's deathbed rather than merely being seriously ill. However, the term 'shechiv mera' has specific legal connotations in Jewish law that are better preserved in the original translation.

[B] Or: "through divine inspiration granted to me" — This alternative is less literal but may better convey to modern readers the concept of divine inspiration behind the author's insights. However, the original translation preserves the biblical imagery of enlightenment which has important kabbalistic connotations.

[1] The Hebrew 'מעבור בשלח' may be alluding to a dangerous crossing or passage, possibly referencing the book's title 'Ma'avar Yabok' (Crossing of the Yabok), which uses the metaphor of a river crossing for the transition from life to death.

[2] The author distinguishes between the traditional confession text (likely drawing on Nachmanides) and his own kabbalistic interpretations and additions.

[1] The concept of 'bringing merit to the many' (zikui ha-rabim) was considered one of the highest about an adulterous woman as a metaphor for the Angel of Death, suggesting that just as the woman denies wrongdoing after her sin, the Angel of Death claims innocence after destroying lives, asserting it was merely executing divine judgment. | Cf. Psalm 104:29 — The author creatively reinterprets this psalm verse, which typically refers to God taking away breath/spirit causing death, to suggest that the radiance seen on the righteous before death represents an addition of spiritual purity just before expiration—inverting the usual meaning to suggest death as spiritual elevation. | Cf. Gaon of Fano (Rabbi Menahem Azariah da Fano) — The author refers to Rabbi Menahem Azariah da Fano (1548-1620), an important Italian kabbalist, as 'my teacher,' suggesting a direct or intellectual lineage. The reference to Moses' radiant face (Exodus 34:29-35) creates a parallel between the divine radiance seen on the pious man before death and the luminous face of Moses after divine encounter.

[iv] Vidui (confession) was considered essential for a proper death in Jewish tradition. The term 'shechiv mera' (שכיב מרע) is Aramaic for 'one who lies ill' and has specific legal connotations in Jewish law regarding the validity of deathbed declarations.

[v] The author distinguishes between the traditional confession liturgy he will present and his own 'chidushim' (innovative interpretations or insights), reflecting the rabbinic value of balancing tradition with thoughtful innovation.

[vi] This phrase reflects the kabbalistic concept that mystical insights are received through divine illumination rather than merely intellectual effort, positioning the author as a channel for divine wisdom rather than its originator.

[i] This reflects the Jewish concept of 'zikui ha-rabim' (bringing merit to many), which was considered one of the highest spiritual virtues. By sharing his divinely inspired insights, the author helps others fulfill the mitzvah of proper confession, thereby accruing merit both for himself and for those who benefit from his work.

[ii] Cf. Masechet Semachot — The author draws on this text as a primary source for deathbed confession practices, establishing traditional authority for the rituals he presents | Cf. Zohar — The author bases his kabbalistic understanding of confession on Zoharic teachings about spiritual purification and the soul's journey after death | Cf. Ramban (Nachmanides) — The author acknowledges Ramban as a primary source for the traditional confession text he will present, establishing its authenticity and religious authority

במסכת שמחות כך כתיב[i] נוטה למיתה אומרים לו התודה שהרבה התודו ולא מתו והרבה לא התודו ומתו והרבה הולכים על רגליהם בשוק ומתודים ובזכות שהתודה תחיה וכו׳.[ii] לא דברים מחיים ולא דברים ממיתים שמא הלויתי או שמא הלווך אדם. שמא הפקדת אצל בני אדם או שמא הפקידו אצלך. עוד כתוב בספרי כל המתים טעונים ודוי שנאמר ואשמה הנפש ההיא והתודה וגו׳.[iii] אמרו רז״ל שעכן בא לעולם הבא מפני שהתודה[iv] וברבה דף קצ״ד שערי תפלה לעולם נפתחים ובפרט לחולה שה׳ סועד אותו ולא תהיה תפלתו עקרה אלא תהא עולה ותעשה פירות כדאמר אבא יודן לחכמי ישראל ברבה פרשת ראה ובירושלמי במסכת הוריות. וכתוב בספר הזהר פרשת נשא דף קכ״ג דתשובה מעליא כד אתמסר נפשא לגבה ועייל לה בזמנא דאיהי בתשובה.

In Masechet Semachot it is written thus: "For one who is approaching death, we say to him, 'Confess,' for many have confessed and did not die,[1] and many did not confess and died, and many walk on their feet in the marketplace and confess, and by the merit of your confession, you may live, etc." [Confession] is not something that sustains life nor something that causes death. [Ask him:] "Perhaps you have lent money to someone or perhaps someone has lent to you?[2] Perhaps you have deposited something with others or perhaps others have deposited something with you?" It is further written in the Sifrei: "All who die require confession, as it is said, 'When that person becomes guilty, he shall confess...'" Our Sages of blessed memory said that Achan merited the World to Come because he confessed. And in Rabbah, page 194, [it states that] the gates of prayer are always open, especially for the sick person whom God sustains, and his prayer will not be barren but will ascend and bear fruit, as Abba Yudan said to the Sages of Israel in Rabbah, Parashat Re'eh, and in the Jerusalem Talmud in Tractate Horayot. And it is written in the Book of the Zohar, Parashat Naso, page 123, that "superior repentance is when the soul is delivered to it[3] and enters it at the time when it is in a state of repentance. Then everything is rectified spiritual virtues in Judaism. The author views his work as a means of helping others properly prepare for death, thereby accumulating merit both for himself and for those who benefit from his guidance.

[2]This passage establishes an important theological principle that confession (vidui) is not an admission of imminent death, but rather a spiritual practice that could potentially lead to healing. The text deliberately addresses the common fear that confession might hasten death by clarifying that it is neither life-sustaining nor death-causing in itself.

[3]These questions reveal the practical aspect of deathbed confession, focusing on resolving outstanding financial and interpersonal matters. This demonstrates how Ma'avar Yabok approaches death preparation as requiring both spiritual and worldly reconciliation.

[1]This mystical description from the Zohar presents repentance at the time of death as having extraordinary cosmic significance. The cryptic phrasing refers to the soul entering into a state of repentance that creates spiritual rectification across multiple worlds.

[iii]The author references Masechet Semachot (Tractate Joys), which despite its name actually deals with laws of mourning. It is sometimes called Evel Rabbati (Great Mourning) and is considered a minor tractate from the post-Talmudic period that collects various funeral and mourning traditions.

[iv]The phrase 'etc.' (וכו׳) indicates the author is abbreviating the quoted text. The original continues with instructions not to allow the ill person to think confession hastens death.

[v]This is a reference to Numbers 5:6-7, which discusses the requirement of confession when a person commits certain sins. The full verse reads: 'When a man or woman commits any of the sins against man to commit treachery against God, and that person is [found] guilty, they shall confess the sin which they committed.'

[i]Achan, who is referenced here, was put to death for taking forbidden spoils during the conquest of Jericho (Joshua 7). His confession before execution, according to this rabbinic interpretation, earned him a place in the World to Come despite his punishment in this world.

Ramban wrote the order of confession for a deathly ill person (shechiv mera),[2] which we received thus from pious individuals and people of good deeds. This is its text:[3] It is appropriate for every deathly ill person to make a will, seek forgiveness from everyone against whom he has sinned, request that many assist him with prayer, make complete repentance, drop his hands,[4] and wrap himself in tzitzit. He should say:

50R

[2]This refers to the spiritual merit of forgoing one's natural desire for revenge or holding grudges. The text emphasizes that forgiveness of others at the end of life is particularly powerful for securing divine forgiveness of one's own transgressions.

[3]The term 'shechiv mera' (abbreviated as ש"מ in the original) is an Aramaic legal term referring specifically to someone on their deathbed, whose legal status differs from both healthy individuals and those with non-life-threatening illnesses.

[1]The passage ends here but would have been followed by the actual confession text. The formulaic ending indicates that what follows is a direct quotation of the confession that should be recited.

[2]This likely refers to a gesture of submission or surrender, symbolizing the relinquishing of worldly concerns and submission to divine judgment.

[ii]This is a reference to a Talmudic teaching (Rosh Hashanah 17a) that states: 'Whoever foregoes his natural reactions [to being wronged] will have all his transgressions forgiven.' The concept emphasizes the spiritual value of forgiveness and not holding grudges.

[iii]Cf. Masechet Semachot — This tractate (also known as Evel Rabbati) focuses on laws of mourning and death. The quotation provides the halakhic basis for deathbed confession, emphasizing that confession is spiritually beneficial but not deterministic of physical outcomes. | Cf. Sifrei — This midrashic work links confession to the biblical verse in Numbers 5:6-7 about guilt offerings, establishing a textual basis for the practice of confession before death. | Cf. Zohar — This kabbalistic text elevates the concept of deathbed confession beyond mere ritual to a cosmic act that has spiritual impact across multiple worlds and realms. | Cf. Story of Achan — This biblical reference to Achan, who confessed to stealing forbidden spoils from Jericho before his execution, is used to demonstrate that confession has merit for the World to Come even when it cannot save one's physical life.

[iv]Ramban (Rabbi Moses ben Nachman, 1194-1270), also known as Nachmanides, was a prominent Spanish Talmudist, kabbalist, and Torah commentator. Here, Ma'avar Yabok cites his instructions regarding the deathbed confession ritual.

[i]The phrase "pious individuals and people of good deeds" is a traditional way of referring to exemplary religious figures whose practices establish authoritative customs. Citing them lends weight to the ritual instructions that follow.

[ii]The physical gestures prescribed—dropping the hands and wrapping in tzitzit (ritual fringes)—create a bodily dimension to the spiritual preparation for death. The wrapping in tzitzit specifically connects the dying person to the commandments they observed in life.

He should recite "Happy are those who dwell in Your house" until the end of the psalm. And Psalm 86, "A prayer of David. Incline Your ear, O Lord," and he should say Psalm 4, "Answer me when I call," and Psalm 121, "A song of ascents. I lift up my eyes." Afterward, he should recite the confession for a deathly ill person with great intention,[1] as we received it from pious individuals and people of good deeds. This is its text:

[3]This threefold declaration of truth regarding God, Torah, and Moses represents a final affirmation of faith, establishing the dying person's spiritual standing before their departure.

[4]The Hebrew term 'kavvanah' (intention) refers to focused mental concentration and spiritual devotion during prayer, considered especially important during deathbed rituals when the person's spiritual state is believed to affect their soul's journey after death.

[iii]This threefold affirmation of truth resembles the recitation of the Shema, traditionally considered the ideal final words before death. It affirms the three foundational elements of Jewish faith: God, Torah, and prophetic revelation.

[iv]The notation "סימן פ״ו" refers to Psalm 86, indicating that the full psalm should be recited. This system of referencing psalms by their numbers was common in liturgical texts.

[v]Cf. Ramban (Nachmanides) — The author explicitly attributes this deathbed ritual procedure to Ramban, positioning it as an authoritative halakhic tradition passed down through generations of pious practitioners rather than a novel innovation. | Cf. Psalm 84:5 — This psalm verse establishes a tone of divine protection and blessing, appropriate for someone seeking spiritual comfort at the end of life. | Cf. The Shema declaration — This affirmation of faith functions similarly to reciting the Shema, which Jewish tradition prescribes as the ideal final words before death, creating a connection between the dying person and foundational Jewish beliefs.

[i]This phrase, 'God of gods and Lord of lords,' comes from Deuteronomy 10:17, establishing the confession's biblical foundation.

[ii]The Aramaic phrase 'bar minan' (literally 'outside of us') is an apotropaic formula to ward off the negative thing being mentioned (in this case, death). Its use here shows the careful balance between preparing for death while still hoping for life.

[1] This request combines the twin afterlife aspirations in Jewish tradition: continued connection to Torah study (intellectual/spiritual) and enjoyment of Gan Eden (reward/pleasure).

[2] The Hebrew 'מְצִיאוּת גְּמוּרָה' is a philosophical term reflecting Maimonides' view of God's necessary existence, contrasted with the contingent existence of created beings.

[3] This statement reflects the kabbalistic concept that God's unity is fundamentally different from mathematical oneness, being complete and indivisible rather than a unit that can be multiplied or divided.

[iii] This statement about the superiority of Moses' prophecy corresponds to the seventh of Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Faith, showing how this confession incorporates core theological doctrine.

[i] Cf. Mishneh Torah by Maimonides — This confession closely follows Maimonides' formulation of essential Jewish beliefs, particularly regarding God's incorporeality, unity, and the superiority of Mosaic prophecy, showing that this deathbed confession was designed to affirm core theological principles before death. | Cf. Yom Kippur Liturgy — By incorporating language from the Day of Atonement liturgy, this deathbed confession connects the individual's final moments to the annual communal day of forgiveness, suggesting that proper death preparation serves as a personal Yom Kippur. | Cf. Psalm 19:15 — This psalm verse, traditionally used to conclude the Amidah prayer, serves here to frame the deathbed confession as a formal liturgical act, connecting the dying person's final words to the daily prayers of the living community.

[ii] This phrase indicates that the author is providing an abbreviated alternative for when the dying person is unable to recite the full confession due to their deteriorating condition or imminent death.

ויאמר:[ii] [i]ונושא את עשר אצבעותיו כלפי מעלה his ten fingers upward[A] and say:

יְהִי רָצוֹן מִלְּפָנֶיךָ שֶׁיִּהְיֶה שָׁלוֹם מְנוּחָתִי:[v] [iv] רִבּוֹנוֹ שֶׁל עוֹלָם[iii] Master of the Universe,[B] may it be Your will that my rest shall be peaceful.[C]

ובמעמד ויחודו[vii] ויכוין בשם ית׳[vi] And he should focus his intention[1] on the Divine 105R the dying person rather than the abstract notion of time, which might be more clear to modern readers unfamiliar with this euphemism for approaching death.

[B]Or: "he should lift all ten fingers toward heaven" — This alternative makes the religious nature of the gesture more explicit by using 'heaven' instead of the more directional 'upward,' emphasizing the spiritual dimension of this act.

[C]Or: "Sovereign of the World" — While 'Master of the Universe' is the most common translation, 'Sovereign of the World' captures the aspect of divine kingship and governance that is implicit in the Hebrew. This might be preferred in contexts emphasizing God's role as ruler rather than owner.

[D]Or: "peace shall be my repose" — This more poetic rendering emphasizes 'peace' by placing it at the beginning of the phrase, which might better capture the emphasis in the Hebrew where 'shalom' precedes 'menuchati.'

[1]The original term is "yekhavin" (ויכוין) from the root כ-ו-נ, which specifically refers to the Jewish spiritual practice of kavvanah—directed mental concentration during prayer. This is more than mere focus but a specific devotional technique.

[iii]This gesture has deep kabbalistic significance. The ten fingers correspond to the ten sefirot (divine emanations), and raising them symbolizes the soul's return to its divine source. When speech is no longer possible, this physical gesture serves as a non-verbal confession and declaration of faith.

[iv]Cf. Genesis 49:33 — The raising of ten fingers symbolizes surrender to God at the moment of death, similar to how Jacob gathered himself before dying. It represents a final conscious act of faith when speech is no longer possible. | Cf. Exodus 17:11 — The gesture of raising hands upward symbolizes complete reliance on divine assistance at a moment of extreme vulnerability, connecting the dying person's final moments to Moses' gesture of dependence on God. | Cf. Ma'avar Yabok, Chapter 35 — This brief instruction is part of a larger system of deathbed rituals detailed in Chapter 35, where the author discusses the mystical significance of the soul's departure and how proper intentions facilitate peaceful transition.

[v]"Master of the Universe" is a common form of address to God in Jewish prayer, particularly in personal supplications.

[vi]This phrase "my rest shall be peaceful" refers to the soul's repose after death. In the context of Ma'avar Yabok, this short prayer appears as part of the deathbed ritual when the dying person is too weak to recite the full confession (vidui).

[vii]Cf. Full deathbed confession (vidui) — This short prayer encapsulates the essential spiritual attitude recommended for the moment of death: peaceful acceptance of divine judgment and hope for tranquility in the afterlife. It represents the minimum spiritual preparation necessary when a person is too weak for the full confession. | Cf. Genesis 49:33 — This prayer echoes the peaceful death of Jacob (whose crossing of the Yabok River gives the book its title). Just as Jacob completed his life's work and died peacefully, this prayer expresses hope for a similarly peaceful transition. | Cf. Psalm 31:6 — Though not directly quoting this verse, the prayer expresses a similar sentiment of surrendering oneself to God at the moment of death. This verse from Psalms is explicitly recommended elsewhere in Ma'avar Yabok for recitation at the moment of death.

[i]The instruction to 'focus intention on the Divine Name' refers to the practice of kavvanah (directed concentration) during prayer, specifically directing one's thoughts toward the Tetragrammaton (YHVH). The abbreviation ית׳ stands for יתברך (may He be blessed).

[ii]This refers to the theological concept of God's absolute unity, a central tenet of Jewish faith. In Kabbalistic thought, meditation on divine unity is considered particularly powerful at moments of spiritual transition.

It seems to me, the humble writer,[2] that it is beneficial to encourage the sick person[3] to place at least twenty-six coins[4] in the charity box or patients' fund, or to give them directly to a worthy poor person before beginning the confession. If one adds up to ninety-one coins, corresponding to the unification of the divine names YHVH and Adonut, how good that is. And if one adds up to one hundred and twelve coins, corresponding to YHVH, Ehyeh, and Adonut, how good and pleasant that is. For one who gives more, more life is added, since through actions below, actions above are aroused, and through this the Tree of Life is awakened to add to the Tree of Death,[5] and [2]In the Jewish tradition, the Divine Name (YHVH) is considered too sacred to pronounce. During prayer, focus on this name carries special significance, particularly at moments of spiritual transition like approaching death.

[3]The original text uses "vidui" (הודוי), which specifically refers to the ritual confession recited before death. This practice is considered essential for proper spiritual preparation and is mentioned several times in the Talmud.

[4]The phrase 'הדיוט הכותב' is a common expression of humility used by rabbinic authors, indicating the author's self-perception as an ordinary person rather than a great scholar.

[5]The original Hebrew uses the phrase 'להשתדל עם החולה' which literally means 'to strive with the sick person,' suggesting active encouragement rather than mere suggestion.

[6]The Hebrew term 'פרוטות' refers specifically to the smallest denomination of currency. In this context, the emphasis is on the number rather than the monetary value.

[1]This complex kabbalistic concept describes how divine mercy (Tree of Life) becomes activated through charity to balance divine judgment (Tree of Death), creating a state of cosmic harmony.

[iii]The instruction to contemplate the revelation at Mount Sinai creates a connection between the individual's deathbed confession and the paradigmatic moment of divine revelation in Jewish history. This elevates the confession to a moment of profound spiritual encounter.

[iv]"El Melekh" (God, King) refers to the beginning of a prayer known as "El Melekh Yoshev" (God, King who sits upon a throne of mercy), which is commonly recited before confessional prayers. It begins a sequence invoking divine mercy, appropriate after confession.

[v]Cf. Ma'avar Yabok — This reference connects to earlier sections of Ma'avar Yabok that detail the kabbalistic significance of the vidui ritual. Chapter 28 explains how proper intention during confession creates cosmic repairs in higher spiritual realms. | Cf. Zohar — The instruction to contemplate divine unity reflects Zoharic teachings that such meditations at the time of death facilitate the soul's peaceful transition and its reunion with its divine source. | Cf. Shulchan Aruch — Ma'avar Yabok's instructions align with halakhic requirements for deathbed confession while adding mystical dimensions that connect the practice to cosmic processes and divine revelation.

[vi]Twenty-six is the numerical value of the Tetragrammaton (YHVH), the four-letter divine name. This establishes a mystical correspondence between the number of coins given and the divine name.

[i]Ninety-one is the combined numerical value of the divine names YHVH (26) and Adonut (65), representing the mystical unification of these complementary aspects of divinity.

[ii]One hundred and twelve is the combined numerical value of the divine names YHVH (26), Ehyeh (21), and Adonut (65), representing a more complete unification of divine attributes.

thus life and joy are found above. And when a person causes this at the time he needs it, the Tree of Life stands over him and the Tree of Death protects him. This is the meaning of "There is one who scatters and yet increases more"—see Bachya on Parashat Behaalotecha, page 193b. 15R

Nothing produces spiritual fruits above like charity given for the sake of divine unification and in secret. One should intend that Tzedek (righteousness) contributes to Tzedakah (charity),[1] and thus the holy Name is found complete. Because of what one does below, so is aroused above. This explains "One who practices charity at all times will be favored," for all the celestial chariots and hosts[2] are blessed and their lights increase appropriately, because they are all called "ET" (time)—see Parashat Vayetze, page 153a. One who gives charity passes through the River of Fire without fear[3] and will stand in His holy place, as we say in Parashat Miketz, and as the Rabbis said on the verse "So they are cut off and pass away," and this is explained at length in Parashat Bechukotai, pages 111b and 113b, on the verse "I will give you your rains." 20R 25R 30R 35R

Perhaps charity will serve as ransom for one's soul, according to what the sage Recanati wrote in Parashat Vayera, that when death is decreed upon a person and an advocate is found for him, there is no remedy until he gives his ransom. This is also found in the Zohar, Parashat Beshalach. Confession accompanied by suffering is favorably received. And they said in Vayikra Rabbah, chapter 27, on the verse "Your righteousness is like the mighty moun- 40R 45R

[2]This is a wordplay in Hebrew between 'צדק' (righteousness) and 'צדקה' (charity), suggesting that the divine attribute of righteousness is activated when humans perform acts of charity.

[3]The terms 'רתיכין' and 'חילין' refer to different categories of angelic forces in kabbalistic cosmology that govern various aspects of creation.

[4]According to kabbalistic tradition, souls must cross the 'River of Fire' (נהר דינור) after death as part of the purification process. This passage suggests that charitable giving provides protection during this spiritual transition.

[iii]The Tree of Life and Tree of Death are kabbalistic metaphors for the divine structures of mercy and judgment. The author describes how charity activates the Tree of Life to mitigate the effects of the Tree of Death.

[iv]This is a quote from Proverbs 11:24, which paradoxically states that one who generously scatters (gives) will increase rather than diminish their wealth.

[v]This phrase alludes to Psalm 106:3, 'Fortunate are those who maintain justice, who practice righteousness at all times.' In kabbalistic interpretation, the practice of charity at 'all times' creates connections with the cosmic dimension of 'time' (ET).

[i]This is from Psalm 36:7, 'Your righteousness is like the mighty mountains.' The midrash interprets this as an analogy for charity's protective power.

tains," just as these mountains hold back the deep from flooding the world, so does charity hold back calamity. And in chapter 26, "Your righteousness, O God, reaches to the heights"—who sustains the upper and lower worlds? The charity that people do with their hands. That is the meaning of "Your righteousness, O God, reaches to the heights." 50R

And they said in the Jerusalem Talmud, Kiddushin, that this statement that one needs a single meritorious deed to tip the scales in his favor applies specifically to the World to Come, but in this world, even if only one angel out of a thousand advocates in his favor, the Holy One, blessed be He, tips the scales toward merit, for any merit whatsoever is sufficient. The author of Yefeh Mareh wrote that this applies only to individual judgments that arise coincidentally in this world, but in the judgment of Rosh Hashanah, one is judged according to the majority of one's deeds. We have thus learned that any merit, however small, has the power to tip the scales[1] in favor of the sick person, to revive his soul and heal him. 55R 60R 65R

One should have in mind when saying "And You are righteous concerning all that has come upon us" to make one's body an altar of atonement, to be purified through the suffering that one endures and accepts with love. This unifies great love with lesser love,[2] and from there the light of the supernal moon rises to become like the light of the sun,[3] for she is purified for her husband through the power of judg- 70R 75R

[1]This reflects the rabbinic concept that divine judgment can be influenced by even small positive actions, particularly in this world where mercy may predominate over strict justice.
[2]In kabbalistic terminology, 'אהבה רבה' (great love) and 'אהבה זוטא' (lesser love) refer to different divine attributes whose unification creates cosmic harmony.
[1]This is a reference to Isaiah 30:26 and represents the restoration of the divine feminine presence (Shekhinah, symbolized by the moon) to her original glory, equal to the divine masculine (symbolized by the sun).

[ii]This is from Psalm 71:19, 'Your righteousness, O God, reaches to the heights.' The midrash interprets this as evidence that human charity sustains both upper and lower worlds.
[iii]These are kabbalistic terms representing different levels of divine love. 'Great love' (אהבה רבה) corresponds to higher divine attributes while 'lesser love' (אהבה זוטא) corresponds to lower attributes. Their unification creates cosmic harmony.
[iv]This is an allusion to Isaiah 30:26, 'The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun.' In kabbalistic thought, this represents the restoration of divine feminine attributes (the moon/Shekhinah) to their original glory, equal to divine masculine attributes (the sun).
[i]Cf. Zohar, Parashat Beshalach — The Zohar passage is cited as authoritative support for the teaching that charitable giving can serve as a spiritual ransom or protection against a death decree. This reference connects the practical act of giving coins with mystical concepts of divine judgment. | Cf. Parashat Bechukotai, Zohar pages 111b and 113b — This Zohar passage is referenced to elaborate on the spiritual mechanics of how charitable giving affects the upper worlds, ment which she has pushed away from herself onto him, to refine and cleanse him.

זהו תמצית לשון ספר הזהר[i] בפ׳ בלק דף קצ״ה[ii] לרמוז הוידוי[iii] מלבד מה שכתוב בזה בפרשה ויקרא ובפרשה פנחס דף רל״א:[iv]

This is the essence of the language of the Zohar[1] in the portion of Balak, page 195, alluding to confession, besides what is written about this[2] in the portion of Vayikra and in the portion of Pinchas, page 231: 5R

כשאדם מפרט חטאיו נקרא חסיד דאתי לקבלא[A] תשובה ואפיק

When a person details his sins, he is called pious,[3] one who comes to receive repentance,[A] and

[E]Or: "one who is prepared to accept repentance" — The Aramaic 'לקבלא' can be interpreted particularly in relation to divine blessing symbolized by rain. | Cf. Vayikra Rabbah, chapter 27 — This midrash provides the theological basis for charity's protective power, using the metaphor of mountains restraining floodwaters to illustrate how charity restrains divine judgments and calamities. | Cf. Jerusalem Talmud, Kiddushin — This reference is used to establish the halakhic basis for the author's claim that even a small merit can have disproportionate spiritual effects for the sick person in this world. | Cf. Bachya on Parashat Behaalotecha, page 193b — This reference connects the biblical proverb about gaining through generous giving to the kabbalistic understanding of how charity activates cosmic mechanisms that return blessing to the giver. | Cf. Recanati on Parashat Vayera — The author cites this kabbalistic authority to support the specific claim that when a death decree exists, charitable giving can serve as a necessary ransom to fulfill the requirements of divine justice. | Cf. Zohar, Parashat Vayetze, page 153a — This reference elaborates on the cosmic effects of charitable giving, explaining how it activates and strengthens the celestial forces called 'ET' (time), creating a comprehensive spiritual blessing. | Cf. Zohar, Parashat Miketz — This reference connects charitable giving to the mystical concept of the 'River of Fire' (Nahar Dinur) that souls must cross after death, suggesting that charity helps the soul navigate this spiritual challenge.

[2]The author uses the phrase "תמצית לשון" (essence of the language) to indicate that what follows is not a direct quote but a distillation of the Zohar's teachings on confession.

[3]The author is indicating that the Zohar discusses confession in multiple places, and that this summary draws primarily from the Balak portion but is supplemented by material from Vayikra and Pinchas as well.

[1]The text creates a paradoxical definition of piety—the very act of admitting one's sins transforms a person into a 'chasid' (pious one). This reflects the Zoharic view that confession itself is a spiritually transformative act.

[ii]The Zohar is the foundational text of Jewish mysticism, composed in the 13th century, containing mystical commentaries on the Torah. It is the central text of Kabbalah.

[iii]The citation refers to the portion of Balak, folio 195, in the standard printed edition of the Zohar.

[iv]The term "רמז" (remez) has specific significance in kabbalistic hermeneutics, referring to the allegorical or hinted meaning beyond the plain text—one of the four levels of interpretation in the PaRDeS system.

[v]Cf. Zohar, Balak 195 — The author is citing the Zohar as the authoritative mystical source for the kabbalistic understanding of deathbed confession that follows. This establishes that the teachings on confession are not the author's personal interpretation but are drawn directly from canonical mystical texts. | Cf. Zohar, Vayikra — The author indicates that the Zohar's teachings on confession appear in multiple sections, showing the importance of this theme throughout kabbalistic literature. The portion of Vayikra in the Zohar would contain material related to sacrifices and purification, connecting confession to these Temple rituals. | Cf. Zohar, Pinchas 231 — The author provides a precise citation to another section of the Zohar that discusses confession, demonstrating scholarly thoroughness and giving readers the ability to verify these teachings in the original source. This shows that the author is synthesizing material from multiple sections of the Zohar to provide a comprehensive view of the mystical significance of confession.

he removes himself from the evil side in which he was immersed in his impurity until now. Now he cleaves to the supernal right,[A] which is extended to receive him. And do not say that the Holy One, blessed be He, does not accept him until he details all his sins from the day he came into the world, or those that are hidden from him. Rather, he need only specify those that he remembers,[1] and if he sets his mind on them, all the others are drawn after them.[2] For we have learned: "We do not examine the upper recesses of the house,"[B] which symbolize the transgressions hidden from him. These are certainly holes made by the mice, which are the wicked ones whose dwelling is around the supernal ark, in the secret of "those who profane it shall surely die." Nor do we examine the lower ones, which symbolize the early sins, but rather according to what his eyes can see. And thus we learned regarding skin afflictions: there are twenty-four limbs that do not become impure through a living tissue, as it is written, "according to all the appearances in the eyes of the priest,"[3] for as 'to accept' rather than 'to receive,' suggesting a more active role in the penitential process.

[F] Or: "attaches himself to the supernal right hand" — In Kabbalistic terminology, 'ימינא' (right) often specifically refers to the right hand, which represents the divine attribute of mercy, making this translation more explicit about the mystical symbolism.

[G] Or: "We do not inspect the upper corners of the house" — The term 'חורי' can be translated as 'corners' rather than 'recesses,' which might better match the Mishnaic source being referenced regarding the inspection for chametz (leavened bread) before Passover.

[2] This teaching provides profound psychological comfort by establishing that complete repentance doesn't require perfect memory of all past transgressions. Instead, sincerely addressing remembered sins creates a spiritual effect that encompasses forgotten ones as well.

[3] The text presents a mystical principle of spiritual contagion or extension, where focusing on remembered sins creates a metaphysical effect that encompasses forgotten sins as well. This establishes that sincere but incomplete confession can still be fully effective.

[1] The text weaves together halakhic concepts from different domains (Passover preparations and skin disease diagnosis) to create a cohesive metaphysical teaching about confession. This demonstrates the author's technique of finding spiritual correspondences between seemingly unrelated areas of Jewish law.

[i] Literally 'he takes himself out from the evil side'—using spatial metaphors to describe spiritual transformation. In Kabbalistic cosmology, the 'evil side' (sitra achra) represents the realm of impurity, often associated with the left side, while the right side represents divine mercy and holiness.

[ii] This is an adaptation of a Mishnaic ruling about searching for leaven (chametz) before Passover, which states that one need not search in places where chametz is unlikely to be found. Here it becomes a metaphor for the confession process.

[iii] The 'supernal ark' likely refers to the divine presence or possibly the sefirah of Malkhut (Kingdom), the lowest of the divine emanations and the receptacle for divine flow. The metaphor suggests that sin creates destructive forces that surround and potentially damage the connection to divinity.

[i] Reference to laws of tzara'at (often mistranslated as 'leprosy'), where certain body parts are not subject to the same rules of ritual impurity as others. The author uses this as an analogy for certain sins being 'covered' by general confession.

In another place it states that all the sins and blemishes of Israel, the Holy One, blessed be He, gives to the Chief Mariner who steers all ships to sink them in the depths of the sea.[1] All his hosts are called the "depths of the sea," for they await the gifts from above like dogs before a table.[2] When the Holy One, blessed be He, takes the sins of Israel who confess with broken hearts (as we explained above in Chapter 4 and in the introduction to our "Illuminators of Dawn"), and casts them upon these forces, they all think these are gifts and presents that He wishes to give to Israel.[3] But now He removes these sins from Israel and gives them to these forces, and immediately they all together seize them, etc. It is known that among the seventy celestial princes, there are four who are chiefs over all of them, and the four kings whom Abraham defeated[4] ruled over these princes. This is what our Sages of blessed memory explained regarding Babylon, Media, etc.

[2]This vivid metaphor describes a spiritual entity that controls forces of evil. In kabbalistic literature, particularly the Zohar, natural elements like the sea often represent spiritual realms where negative forces dwell.

[3]This powerful metaphor appears in several Zoharic passages to describe how forces of impurity eagerly await spiritual sustenance, similar to dogs waiting for scraps to fall from their master's table.

[4]This describes a mystical 'sleight of hand' where forces of impurity are deceived into thinking they're receiving something beneficial when actually they're being loaded with Israel's sins. This conception explains the efficacy of confession from a kabbalistic perspective.

[1]This refers to Genesis 14, where Abraham defeated four kings: Amraphel of Shinar, Arioch of Ellasar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and Tidal of Goiim. The text interprets this historical battle as having cosmic significance in the spiritual realm.
